

CRS Report for Congress

Received through the CRS Web

Vieques, Puerto Rico Naval Training Range: Background and Issues for Congress

Ronald O'Rourke
Specialist in National Defense
Foreign Affairs, Defense, and Trade Division

Summary

On January 10, 2003 the Secretary of the Navy signed a letter of certification to Congress confirming that the Navy and Marine Corps will permanently cease controversial training operations on the Puerto Rican island of Vieques by May 1, 2003. The Administration had announced on June 14, 2001, that it would work toward the goal of ending training operations on Vieques by that date. The Administration's June 2001 announcement superseded a January 2000 agreement between President Clinton and then-Governor of Puerto Rico Pedro Rossello that called for holding a referendum on Vieques in January 2002 to decide the future of military training operations there.

The Secretary's certification was required by Section 1049 of the FY2002 defense authorization act (P.L. 107-107; S. 1438), which (1) canceled the requirement for holding the January 2002 referendum; (2) authorized the Secretary of the Navy to close the Vieques training range if the Secretary certifies that equivalent or superior training facilities exist and are immediately available; (3) required the Secretary, in making this determination, to take into account the views of Navy and Marine Corps leaders; and (4) transferred the lands to the Department of the Interior if the range is closed. The Senate Armed Services Committee's report (H.Rept. 107-151 of May 15, 2002) on the FY2003 defense authorization bill (S. 2514) directs the Navy to submit a report to the congressional defense committees by March 1, 2003 on, among other things, the Navy's progress in identifying an alternate location or locations for the Vieques range. This CRS report will be updated as events warrant.

Background information

The Vieques Training Range. The Commonwealth of Puerto Rico is a U.S. territory in the Caribbean whose people are U.S. citizens. Vieques (pronounced vee-EH-kez) is a small Puerto Rican island a few miles east of mainland Puerto Rico. The Department of the Navy (DoN), which includes the Navy and Marine Corps, purchased the western and eastern ends of the island between 1941 and 1950; the two DoN-owned parcels totaled about 22,000 acres, or about two-thirds of the island. Almost all of the 8,000-acre western parcel, which was used primarily as a naval ammunition depot, was returned by DoN to the Municipality of Vieques on May 1, 2001.

The remaining DoN-owned 14,000-acre eastern parcel has been used by U.S. naval and other military forces since the early 1940s for training exercises involving ship-to-shore gunfire, air-to-ground bombing by naval aircraft, Marine amphibious landings, or some combination. The parcel includes a roughly 11,000-acre Eastern Maneuver Area for Marine Corps ground exercises and a roughly 900-acre Live Impact Area (LIA) designed for targeting by live ordnance. The LIA is at the eastern tip of the island, several miles from the civilian-populated center section of the island, which has about 9,300 residents.

Until April 1999, the Navy used the Vieques training range about 180 days per year. Of these, about 120 days were for integrated (i.e., combined land-sea-air) live-fire exercises (i.e., exercises with explosive ammunition) by U.S. Atlantic Fleet aircraft carrier battle groups and amphibious ready groups preparing to deploy overseas on regular six-month-long deployments to the Mediterranean Sea or Persian Gulf. Until 2001, DoN officials argued adamantly that there is no site other than Vieques where Atlantic Fleet naval forces can conduct integrated live-fire training operations, and that such training operations are critical to fully preparing U.S. naval forces for deployment.

Puerto Rican Discontent and Opposition. U.S. military activities in Puerto Rico have been a source of discontent among Puerto Ricans for several decades. Puerto Rican opposition to DoN activities on Vieques increased after 1975, when DoN withdrew from Culebra, another small Puerto Rican island near Vieques where DoN had conducted some of its live-fire training operations. After withdrawing from Culebra as a consequence of strong Puerto Rican opposition to DoN's use of that island, DoN consolidated its live-fire training operations at Vieques.

Puerto Rican dissatisfaction regarding military training activities on Vieques is driven by several issues: (1) lost potential for economic development due to lack of access to most of the island's land, interruptions to local fishing operations, and the effect of DoN's activities on reducing the potential for developing the island as a tourist destination; (2) the inadequacy of past DoN economic development efforts intended to compensate the Vieques community for this economic loss; (3) damage to the island's environment, ecology, natural resources, historic resources, and archaeological sites caused by DoN training activities; (4) concern that the incidence of cancer or other diseases might be increased by pollutants released into the local environment by DoN training operations; (5) noise, especially from nearby ship-to-shore gunfire; (6) safety (the risk of an off-range accident), and (7) perceived DoN insensitivity in conducting its relations with the Vieques community.

April 19, 1999 Bombing Accident and Subsequent Impasse. On April 19, 1999, the pilot of a Marine Corps F-18 on a training mission mistakenly identified an observation post located just to the west of the LIA (but still well within the overall range perimeter) as its intended target. The two 500-pound bombs dropped by the plane struck the post, killing David Sanes Rodriguez, a Puerto Rican civilian employed as a security guard, and injuring four others. Following the accident, DoN temporarily suspended its use of the range. The accident galvanized Puerto Rican opposition to DoN's activities on the island. Puerto Rican political leaders and overwhelming segments of Puerto Rican public opinion soon declared their firm opposition to any further military training operations on the island and called for DoN to withdraw from the island immediately and return the land to Puerto Rico. At the same time, dozens of demonstrators entered the range (most of which is off-limits to the civilian population) and established several protest camps, preventing DoN from easily resuming training activities there.

Rush Panel. On June 9, 1999, President Clinton asked Secretary of Defense William Cohen to establish a special panel to study the situation. The 4-member panel was chaired by Frank Rush, who was the acting Assistant Secretary of Defense for force management policy. The Rush panel, as it was called, released its report on October 19, 1999. The report recommended, among other things, that DoN should immediately conduct a priority assessment of the training requirements at Vieques with the objective of ceasing all training activities at Vieques within five years. The Navy should take necessary programming actions to ensure that adequate resources are available to facilitate the identification and preparation of alternative locations, to institute necessary changes in training methods, and to provide for restoration and transfer to Puerto Rico of the Eastern Maneuver Area.

Clinton-Rossello Plan. On January 31, 2000, President Clinton announced an agreement with then-Governor of Puerto Rico Pedro Rossello on a plan for resolving the dispute over Vieques. The plan called for holding a referendum of the registered voters of Vieques to determine the future of DoN activities on the island. The referendum, which was later scheduled for November 6, 2001, and subsequently rescheduled for January 2002, would present two choices. One would be for DoN to cease training activities no later than May 1, 2003; the other would be for DoN to continue training, including live-fire training, beyond that date. If voters choose the second option, OMB would submit a $50-million funding request to Congress to finance further infrastructure-improvement and housing projects on the western end of Vieques. Under the plan, DoN would be permitted prior to the referendum to conduct exercises on the range for no more than 90 days a year using only non-explosive ordnance, and the Office of Management and Budget (OMB) would submit a $40-million funding request to Congress to finance a series of community assistance projects on Vieques. The plan also called for transferring DoN lands back to civilian use.

Removal of Protestors and Resumption of Training. On May 4, 2000, more than 300 federal agents moved onto the training range and peacefully removed 216 demonstrators. On May 8, 2000, DoN resumed training operations on the range using non-explosive ordnance. Hundreds demonstrators attempting to reenter the range on various dates after May 4, 2000 have been detained and removed by U.S. forces.

Congressional Activity and Legislation in 1999 and 2000. Hearings devoted to the situation on Vieques were held by the House and Senate Armed Services Committees on September 22, 1999, and by the Senate Armed Services Committee on October 19, 1999 (at which the Rush panel report was released). Several bills were introduced in September and October 1999 that proposed various measures for addressing the situation. Following the announcement of the Clinton-Rossello plan, Congress in 2000 debated the merits of the plan and acted on the administration's request for $40 million in community assistance funding and its proposed land-transfer legislation.

Congress appropriated the $40 million in community assistance funding as part of P.L. 106-246 (H.R. 4425) of July 13, 2000, the combined FY2001 military construction appropriation and FY2000 supplemental appropriations bill. The FY2000 supplemental appropriations portion of the bill (Division B) contains a provision under the Operation and Maintenance, Defense-Wide section that provides $40 million to Vieques for conducting a referendum and for various community and economic assistance projects.

Congress authorized the $40 million, provided land-transfer legislation (with terms modified from those proposed under the Clinton-Rossello plan), and approved other implementing legislation, as Title XV (Sections 1501-1508) of P.L. 106-398 (H.R. 4205) of October 30, 2000, the FY2001 defense authorization bill. (See pages 365-373 and 879-881 of H.Rept. 106-945 of October 6, 2000, the conference report on H.R. 4205.) Section 1502 provided for the May 1, 2001 transfer of the ammunition depot on the western end of the island.

Position of Governor Calderon. On November 7, 2000, Puerto Rico elected a new Governor, Sila Maria Calderon, who took office on January 2, 2001. Calderon did not support the Clinton-Rossello plan and pledged to take steps that would appear to break the accord.

Final Clinton Administration Actions. The Clinton Administration warned Governor Calderon that if Puerto Rico did not fulfill its obligations under the plan, DoN would no longer be obliged to abide by the results of the November 6, 2001 referendum. On January 15 and 19, 2001, President Clinton issued two directives concerning Vieques. The first directed the Department of Health and Human Services to examine a new study showing that residents of Vieques suffer from a high incidence of vibroacoustic disease, an ailment affecting the heart and other internal organs. The second directed DoD to find a long-term alternative to live-fire training on Vieques, on the grounds that voters were likely to vote in the November 2001 referendum to permanently end training operations.

Initial Bush Administration Actions and Puerto Rican Response. The Bush Administration initially supported the Clinton-Rossello plan and held private discussions with Governor Calderon's office. On March 1, 2000, the Bush Administration canceled training operations for an aircraft carrier battle group that were scheduled to take place at Vieques later that month. On April 11, 2001, the Navy notified the Puerto Rican government of its intention to resume training operations at Vieques using inert ordnance (as required by the Clinton-Rossello agreement) starting April 27.

In response, Governor Calderon promised to introduce legislation to tighten noise restrictions in a way that would effectively prohibit the Navy from engaging in ship-to-shore gunfire. She also accused the Defense Department of violating an understanding to suspend training operations on Vieques pending the outcome of independent reviews of studies on the health-effects of the training. Calderon introduced the bill and the Puerto Rican Legislature passed it on April 23. Governor Calderon signed the bill into law, and on April 24, Puerto Rico filed a federal lawsuit to halt the Navy's exercise, arguing that the Navy's training activities would threaten public health and violate both the new noise-restriction law and the 1972 federal Noise Control Act. On January 2, 2002, the court dismissed the lawsuit on jurisdictional grounds, stating that Congress never intended "to create a private action for violations by a federal entity of the state and local environmental noise requirements."

New Bush Administration Plan and Reaction. On June 14, 2001, the Bush Administration announced that it had decided to end military training operations at Vieques by May 1, 2003. Under the Administration's plan, DoN began planning for withdrawal from the island by that date, Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld was to appoint a panel of retired military officers and other experts to seek effective training alternatives to Vieques, and the Defense Department was to seek relief from the requirement to hold the November 2001 referendum (which was rescheduled for January 2002) by asking Congress to pass legislation cancelling sections 1503, 1504 and 1505(b) of P.L. 106-398. After May 1, 2003, the DoN-owned land on the eastern end of the island would be turned over to the Interior Department, which would determine how to clean up and dispose of the land.

Supporters of the military immediately criticized the Bush Administration's new plan on the grounds that it could lead to reduced readiness of U.S. naval forces and complicate the U.S. ability to maintain access to overseas training ranges in places such as Okinawa and South Korea. Some opponents of continued military training operations on the island welcomed the plan because it established with finality that training operations will end by May 1, 2003, but other opponents of the training operations criticized the plan on the grounds that it didn't go far enough – that training operations should end immediately rather than on May 1, 2003.

Governor Calderon welcomed the plan as far as it went but stated that she still wanted training operations to end immediately. She proceeded with her plan to hold a Puerto Rico-sponsored non-binding referendum on July 29, 2001 that gave voters on the island an opportunity to vote in favor of an immediate cessation of training operations – an option that would not be available at the separate January 2002 referendum to be held under the Clinton-Rossello plan. In the July 29 referendum, which drew 80.6 percent of the island's 5,893 registered voters, about 68 percent voted in favor of immediate cessation of training operations, about 30 percent voted to permit operations to continue indefinitely, and about 2 percent voted for operations to cease by May 1, 2003.

On January 7, 2002, the Secretary of the Navy denied a November 2001 request from the Chief of Naval Operations (CNO) and Commandant of the Marine Corps for a Navy battle group led by the carrier John F. Kennedy to train at Vieques. Subsequent Navy battle groups, however, have been permitted to train at Vieques. Most recently, the Navy notified Puerto Rico on December 27, 2002 that a battle group would begin training operations on January 13, 2003, for a period of up to 29 days.

Legislation in 2001 and 2002. The FY2002 defense authorization act (P.L. 107-107; S. 1438) contains a provision (Section 1049) that (1) canceled the requirement for holding the January 2002 referendum; (2) authorized the Secretary of the Navy to close the Vieques range, and terminate all Navy and Marine Corps operations at the Roosevelt Roads naval station that are related exclusively to use of the range, if the Secretary certifies that “one or more alternative training facilities exist that, individually or collectively, provide an equivalent or superior level of training” and are immediately available upon cessation of training on Vieques; (3) required the Secretary, in making this determination, to take into account the written views and recommendations of the Chief of Naval Operations and the Commandant of the Marine Corps; and (4) transferred the range lands to the Department of the Interior if the range is closed.

In its report (H.Rept. 107-151 of May 15, 2002) on the FY2003 defense authorization bill (S. 2514), the Senate Armed Services Committee directs the Secretary of the Navy to provide a report to the congressional defense committees on the plans for joint task force, combined-arms training of carrier battle groups and amphibious ready groups during fiscal year 2003. This report should include a description of the locations where that training will be conducted, the use of live munitions during that training, and a description of the naval and military capabilities to be exercised during training. The report should also describe the Secretary's progress regarding the identification of an alternate location or locations for the training range at Vieques. The committee directs the Secretary to provide this report no later than March 1, 2003. The committee understands that, until such time as a decision is made by the Secretary of the Navy in accordance with Section 1049 of [P.L. 107-107], Navy and Marine Corps training will continue at Vieques as it is currently. (page 311)

Navy Certification To End Training By May 1, 2003. On January 10, 2003 the Secretary of the Navy signed a letter of certification to Congress confirming that the Navy and Marine Corps will permanently cease training operations on Vieques by May 1, 2003. In making the certification, DoD stated that the Navy had identified alternative training sites that collectively will provide equivalent or superior training to the training options provided at Vieques.¹

Potential Issues for Congress

The Bush Administration's new plan for resolving the dispute over Vieques raises potential issues for Congress in the following areas:

- ! Navy certification on replacing Vieques. What is the Navy's new strategy for conducting training operations previously carried out at Vieques? Will the alternative sites collectively provide an equivalent or superior level of training to that provided at Vieques? What were the written views and recommendations of the Chief of Naval Operations and the Commandant of the Marine Corps on the issue, and how did the Secretary of the Navy take them into account in making his certification?
- ! Roosevelt Roads. Much of the DoN presence at the Roosevelt Roads naval base on mainland Puerto Rico opposite Vieques relates to managing operations on Vieques. What effect will the end of training operations on Vieques have on the Navy presence at Roosevelt Roads and on its economic impact in the surrounding community?
- ! Access to other ranges. How might the decision to end training at Vieques affect the U.S. ability to maintain access to overseas training ranges where there is local opposition to U.S. operations, such as Okinawa or South Korea? Does the decision set a bad precedent for managing disputes over ranges, and will it encourage other local populations to step up their opposition to U.S. training activities?

¹ Navy Announces Future Training Strategy For East Coast Forces. Department of Defense New Release, No. 015-03, January 10, 2003, available at [www.defenselink.mil/news/Jan2003/b01102003_bt015-03.html] .