MAJOR EVENTS OF THE NUCLEAR AGE:
A CHRONOLOGY TO ASSIST IN THE ANALYSIS OF
AMERICAN PUBLIC OPINION

PREFACE

As the Table of Contents indicates, this document is organized in four basic parts: (1) Introduction, where we state why we decided to compile the chronology (Purpose) and how we did it (Source, Procedure, Event Categories); (2) Chronology of Events, which is a printout of events, preceded by an explanation of its organization; (3) Index of Chronology, which is an index to the printout of the section on Chronology of Events; and (4) Foldout Table of Event Categories, which is a summary of the event categories and their alphabetic referents and is included to help the analyst use the Chronology and Index early.

INTRODUCTION

Purpose

Essentially, the purpose of the events chronology is to let us test the nature of the interaction between different kinds of events and American national security attitudes.

One of the fundamental projects of the social science research program of the ORNL Civil Defense Research Project is to determine the structure of national security attitudes of the American public; that is, we seek to understand what attitudes exist, what their origins are, and what relationships they have to each other and to other phenomena. We are particularly interested in attitudes toward continental defense, and in changes in attitudes over time, beginning with the initial intrusion of nuclear weapons into the international environment. One of the ways we have tried to get at this structure is by developing a computerized data base of national cross-section surveys of American national security attitudes. This data base involves 121 surveys, conducted from August 1945 to June 1964.

One of the very possible sources of variance in the structure of attitudes over time is the sensitivity and insensitivity of different groups in the American population to different kinds of occurrences in the environment

(local, national, international). However, if we were to determine the relationship of environmental events to American national security attitudes, we had to have an adequate set of events comparable in time period to the survey data base. We did not know and no one we contacted knew of an extant event chronology which included relevant kinds of events, at an appropriate level of detail, and for the requisite time period. Consequently, we had to develop one for ourselves.

As these paragraphs should make clear, we regard this event chronology principally as a reference document. It lets us ask some important and exciting questions of our data base. For example, does the structure of American national security attitudes vary as the event climate varies? If not, this means that American national security attitudes are not sensitive to these very broad kinds of events and that we have to look elsewhere for the bases on which people organize and modify their attitudes. If these attitudes do change in relation to these events, what kind of a time lag is there between the occurrence of the event and the attitude change? Do they change in relation to some events, but not to others? Do some identifiable aggregates of Americans modify their attitudes in relation to environmental occurrences and others not? Et cetera.

Source Documents

The events listed in the chronology were abstracted from entries in the World Almanac and Book of Facts, 1945-1964. We checked our list for omissions by comparing it with the occurrences reported in the "Year in Review" sections of relevant editions of The New York Times.

We decided to use the World Almanac as our basic source document only after looking at a number of alternative sources. We felt that it had the following advantages:

1. Relative to other source materials, the Almanac represents a more complete list of those events which might be expected to have received general media attention during these years. For example, its entries are more typical of general media content than are items in the New York Times Index, an index of a newspaper biased toward a particular group in the population (the relatively well-educated) and events in a particular geographical center (Northeastern United States, particularly New York City). In addition, the Almanac includes events salient to those Americans attracted to "human-size" occurrences and personalities of public life, as well as those salient to Americans interested in the issues of public life. In general, we felt that we could assume that its inclusions and omissions roughly parallel the information opportunities and interests of the vast majority of our public opinion survey respondents.

2. The Almanac includes both domestic and international events from a large number of potentially relevant behavior domains.
3. Since the Almanac is compact (each year bound in a separate volume) and reasonably concise, it is a manageable, convenient source.

The Almanac also had several disadvantages, none of which seemed to us to outweigh its advantages:

1. The format of the Almanac over the twenty year period changed sufficiently to create problems for standardized abstracting.
2. The different volumes of the Almanac do not report even approximately the same number of events. There is a particularly sharp decrease in the number of events reported between the volumes for 1945-1958 and those for 1959-1964.

Procedures

Our first step in compiling the chronology was to establish an adequate set of event concepts for categorizing the events in ways that appeared promising for discriminating groups differentially sensitive to types of events. (As we note in the "Event Categories" section, we could use other categories, and sort the events on the basis of entirely different concepts.) While we tested the adequacy of these event concepts, we made decisions about compilation rules, the variety and complexity of which are probably only appreciated by those familiar with coding disparate verbal materials. (See "Event Categories," below, for the important details of those rules.) In selecting events from the Almanac to abstract, our basic objective was to include all events which might conceivably account for variance in American national security opinions during these twenty years. Operationally, this meant that for certain types of events we abstracted all references in the Almanac to that type, regardless of how minor they might be. In the case of other types of events we abstracted only events which the Almanac treated as having been important during that year, i.e., discriminated from less important events by amount of coverage and certain typographical devices specific to the Almanac. For these second types of events we abstracted events which the Almanac treated as minor only if in later years these minor events were generally recognized to have been important. After the events were abstracted and categorized, they were keypunched so that they would be amenable to computer manipulations, such as sorting.*

Event Categories

To assist the user in subsequent analytic applications of the chronology, we grouped the events into twenty-six categories, each event being assigned to one and only one category. The reader should note that these categories do not represent a complete scheme into which all possible events could be integrated. The categories we created were derived empirically from the actual events which occurred during these twenty years, and presumably coding a different time period might require a different set of categories.

The criteria we used to categorize the events are stated below. These criteria let us distinguish one category from another, but, like the criteria for all such coding systems, are relatively arbitrary. If the user anticipates searching for certain classes of events (as opposed to a specific event, which can be retrieved through the chronology index), these criteria should tell him under what category events of that type are listed. We should emphasize that while these particular categories are useful for our present research objectives, we and users with different objectives could re-sort the events into other categories, e.g., into nation categories.

* Obviously, a longer and more complex chronology could be compiled if one wanted to invest considerably more time in it. However, it appeared to us that our needs, the analytic opportunities provided by the surveys, and our resources did not justify such an effort.

Table 1. Event Categories

Parameters of Classes of Categories	Event Categories and Parameters of Each*
Categories A and B: These two categories contain all references to technological achievements except military technical achievements (see categories C and D, below). In the last decade these categories have been used primarily for space achievements.	A. Technology -- U.S.: This category includes: <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. All U.S. space shots represented as technical accomplishments, specifically: <ol style="list-style-type: none"> a. all of the early missile and satellite shots; b. after the first manned shot, only additional manned shots and shots aimed at the moon and planets. 2. Important non-military U.S. technical accomplishments (e.g., development of nuclear-powered vehicles, discovery of new elements). B. Technology -- Foreign: This category contains the non-military technical accomplishments of nations other than the United States. See category (A) for its distinguishing characteristics.
Categories C and D: These two categories include all military activities except those associated with actual fighting and challenges to political power, such as wars and coups (see categories T and U, below).	C. Military -- U.S.: This category includes: <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. all nuclear weapons tests; 2. important changes in the deployment of U.S. missiles and/or nuclear weapons which are based outside of the U.S. territorial boundaries; 3. all U.S. troop movements outside of U.S. territorial boundaries; 4. important changes in the capabilities of the U.S. military forces. D. Military -- Foreign: This category contains the military activities of nations other than the United States. See category (C) for its distinguishing characteristics.
Categories E and F: These two categories include all those exchanges between nations which terminated in formal agreements, such as treaties and pacts. Exchanges between nations which did not terminate in formal agreements are listed under categories R and S, below.	E. Treaties, Pacts, Bans, Foreign Aid -- U.S. Involved: This category includes: <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. all treaties, pacts, bans, and foreign aid agreements between the U.S. and nations of the Communist bloc; 2. all treaties, pacts, bans, and foreign aid agreements which imply or result from changes in U.S. policy; 3. all treaties, pacts, bans, and foreign aid agreements which are associated in any way with missiles and/or nuclear weapons and to which the U.S. is a party. F. Treaties, Pacts, Bans, Foreign Aid -- U.S. Not Involved: This category includes: <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. all treaties, pacts, bans, and foreign aid agreements between Britain, and/or France, and/or West Germany and nations of the Communist bloc; 2. all treaties, pacts, bans, and foreign aid agreements which imply or result from changes in the policy of any nation;

	K. Scandals -- U.S. This category includes all citations of scandals in the U.S. except indictments of businesses for anything less than "massive" price fixing.
	L. Race -- U.S.: This category includes all references to race incidents except isolated legal proceedings not associated with a major civil rights campaign.
	M. Labor and Economics -- U.S.: This category includes: <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. all labor strikes of more than one week's duration which affected the entire nation, or an entire state, or an important city; 2. important drops and gains in the stock market; 3. all economic recessions and booms which were discussed for more than three months.
Categories N and Q: These two categories include all references to significant elections and the events associated with them, but exclude campaign speeches (see categories P and Q).	N. Elections -- U.S.: This category includes: <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. all election results in the U.S. in the Presidential election and "off" years; 2. all national party convention references; 3. results of important primary elections. O. Elections -- Foreign: This category includes: <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. all election results in Britain, France, and West Germany; 2. all election results in nations treated by the Almanac as trouble spots; 3. all political referenda with international import, such as referenda prior to the granting of national independence.
Categories P and Q: These two categories include references to verbal behaviors within one nation, except where these behaviors are clearly designated as communications to another nation (see categories R and S). Although specific statements of government policy are coded here, these categories also handle verbal behaviors which are not sufficiently defined for us to place them in more specifically relevant categories.	P. Major Speeches, Congressional Hearings and Debates, Announcements of Policy, Bills, Executive Orders -- U.S.: This category includes: <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. all verbal behaviors relating to important: <ol style="list-style-type: none"> a. crises and trouble spots; b. changes in policy; c. laws and executive orders; d. issues in election campaigns; e. domestic controversies;

Categories R and S: These two categories include references to non-violent interactions between two or more nations. All statements by one nation which are clearly directed at another are listed here; if they are not obviously so directed, they are handled in categories P and Q. If it is not clear whether an interaction was a "visit" or an "exchange," it is coded as a "visit." If a formal agreement concluded the exchange, it is treated as two events, and coded under categories E or F and categories R or S.	R. Verbal and Political Exchanges -- Between U.S. and Foreign: This category includes: <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. all non-violent interactions, such as exchanged notes, between the U.S. and another nation during periods of international crisis or in relation to a trouble spot; 2. all non-violent interactions which imply or result from improved relations between the U.S. and another nation, e.g., cultural exchanges, informal economic agreements. S. Verbal and Political Exchanges -- Between Foreign and Foreign: This category includes: <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. all non-violent interactions between any nation of the Communist bloc and either Britain, France, or West Germany; 2. all non-violent interactions between or among nations of the Communist bloc; 3. all non-violent interactions between or among nations that are "traditional" enemies; 4. all non-violent interactions between the Soviet Union and the neutral nations.
Categories T and U: These two categories include all references to violence within one nation and violent interactions between two or more nations. Specifically, it includes: <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. all meetings among West European allies; 2. all meetings among nations about international crises and trouble spots; 3. all meetings not included in categories V, W, or X which include 10 or more participants.
	Z. Other -- Everywhere: This category is a residual category and is used as infrequently as possible. It handles all events which could not be coded in any of the other 25 categories. Examples of events listed here are: deaths or illnesses of important persons; disasters; war crimes trials.

* Although the alphabetic categories are mutually exclusive, the numeric sub-categories (the 1, 2, 3, 4's) are not necessarily mutually exclusive.

CHRONOLOGY OF EVENTS

Organization of the Chronology

The entries in this list of events have been sorted in the following way. First, they are listed chronologically by year: all events for any one year will be found together, and the events for later years follow those for earlier years. Second, within each year they are grouped by event category; all events in a given category for a given year will be found together. The event categories are listed alphabetically, category (A) preceding category (B), etc. Third, within each event category of any given year, the events are listed chronologically by month. Fourth, events of any given year, under any given category, within any given month are assigned an event sequence number, starting in each case with number 01 and continuing for as many events as are found within that month of that category of that year.

This sorting pattern was one of several options available to us, and was selected because it seemed most appropriate to the analyses we planned. Other lists of these events can be generated with different sorting patterns, e.g., in strict chronological order, sorted first by year and then by month.

Each entry has the same format. The first line(s) identifies the event category under which that event has been listed: it gives both the alphabetic code for that category and its verbal title. The second line gives the date on which that event occurred (month and year). The third line(s) states the event itself. Immediately to the left of each entry is its reference number. (See Fig. 1)

INDEX OF THE CHRONOLOGY

Organization of the Index

This index was compiled from the list of events by a digital computer. It includes all occurrences of every "keyword" (word considered important) in an alphabetic index list. The keyword appears in the center of a line, 102 characters long, which establishes the context within which the word was used. To the right of each keyword-in-context is the reference number of the event to which that keyword belongs, followed by its unique ascension number. (See Fig. 2)

Fig. 2. Chronology Index Example

The index lists only 102 characters from the entry for each event. In the case of a short entry (like our examples in Fig. 2) this may include the entire event, but frequently it will not. In these cases, in order to read the entire entry for the event, it is necessary to refer back to the chronology. The user can work from the index to the chronology quickly and easily by using the reference number for each event. This number is found in exactly the same form immediately to the right of the indexed item and immediately to the left of the chronology entry. For example, to look up in the chronology the entry for the second item in the example above, one would first find the year (1945), then the category (M) within that year, then the month (December) within that category. This particular event will be the second (02) event listed in the chronology under category M in December 1945. Since this index lists only the alphabetic label for each event category, we have included a foldout of the event category headings immediately after the index. (See Table 2.)

Since this index was compiled by a computer, it is complete for any given keyword. If one looks up, for example, "Kennedy" in the index, one can be certain that every entry in the event chronology that includes the word "Kennedy" will be listed there.

List of Non-Keywords

Certain non-keywords have been completely excluded from this index. These are words like "the" and "is," words which have no special events significance and which are so common that, had we not excluded them, each would have generated pages of index items. The complete list of non-keywords follows. No entry will be found in the index for any of these words.

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

During a summer in residence at ORNL Erik V. Nordheim of the University of California at Berkeley worked diligently at abstracting and categorizing the events listed in the chronology. Pamela B. Wilcox was primarily responsible for preparing and editing the abstracted events for this publication, and Sue B. Bobrow, Patricia S. Defenderfer, and Joanne Levey assisted in various ways. Robert J. Barnard of the ORGDP computer facility did the programming and machine operations that make the event data accessible and manipulable. Davis B. Bobrow conceived of and directed the entire activity.
