

NEWSPAPERS IN THE 21ST CENTURY: HOW NDNP STATE PROJECTS DELIVER THE NEWS

Ann Howington and Sarah Lynn Fisher, University of North Texas

DATA CHARTS BASED ON STATES' WEBSITES

Types of Newspaper Content Available

About half of the states point users to Chronicing America to view the newspapers, and the other half provide access autonomously. Some link to additional digitized newspaper collections out of the scope of NDNP.

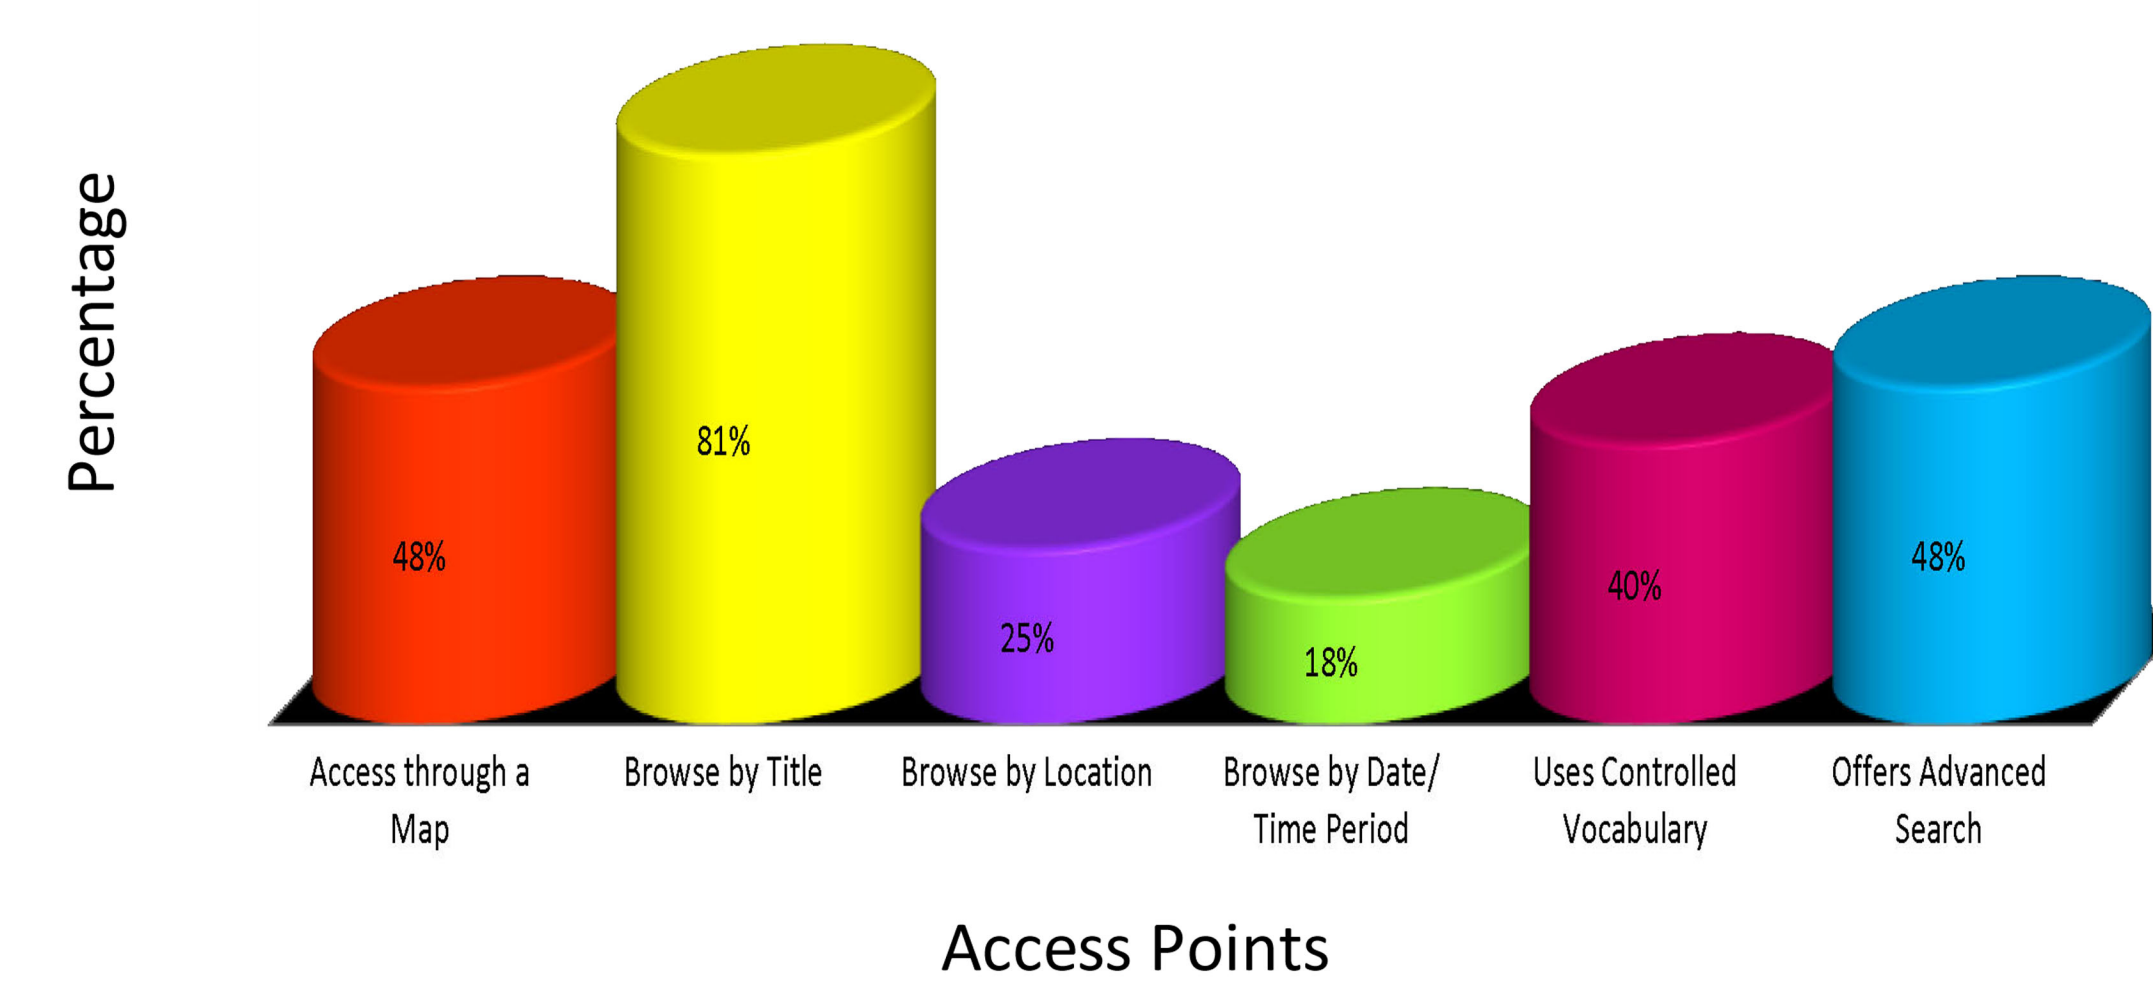

The newspaper boy is a relic from the past.

NDNP Awardees are creating their own digital newspaper sites to provide free access to content digitized through NDNP and beyond.

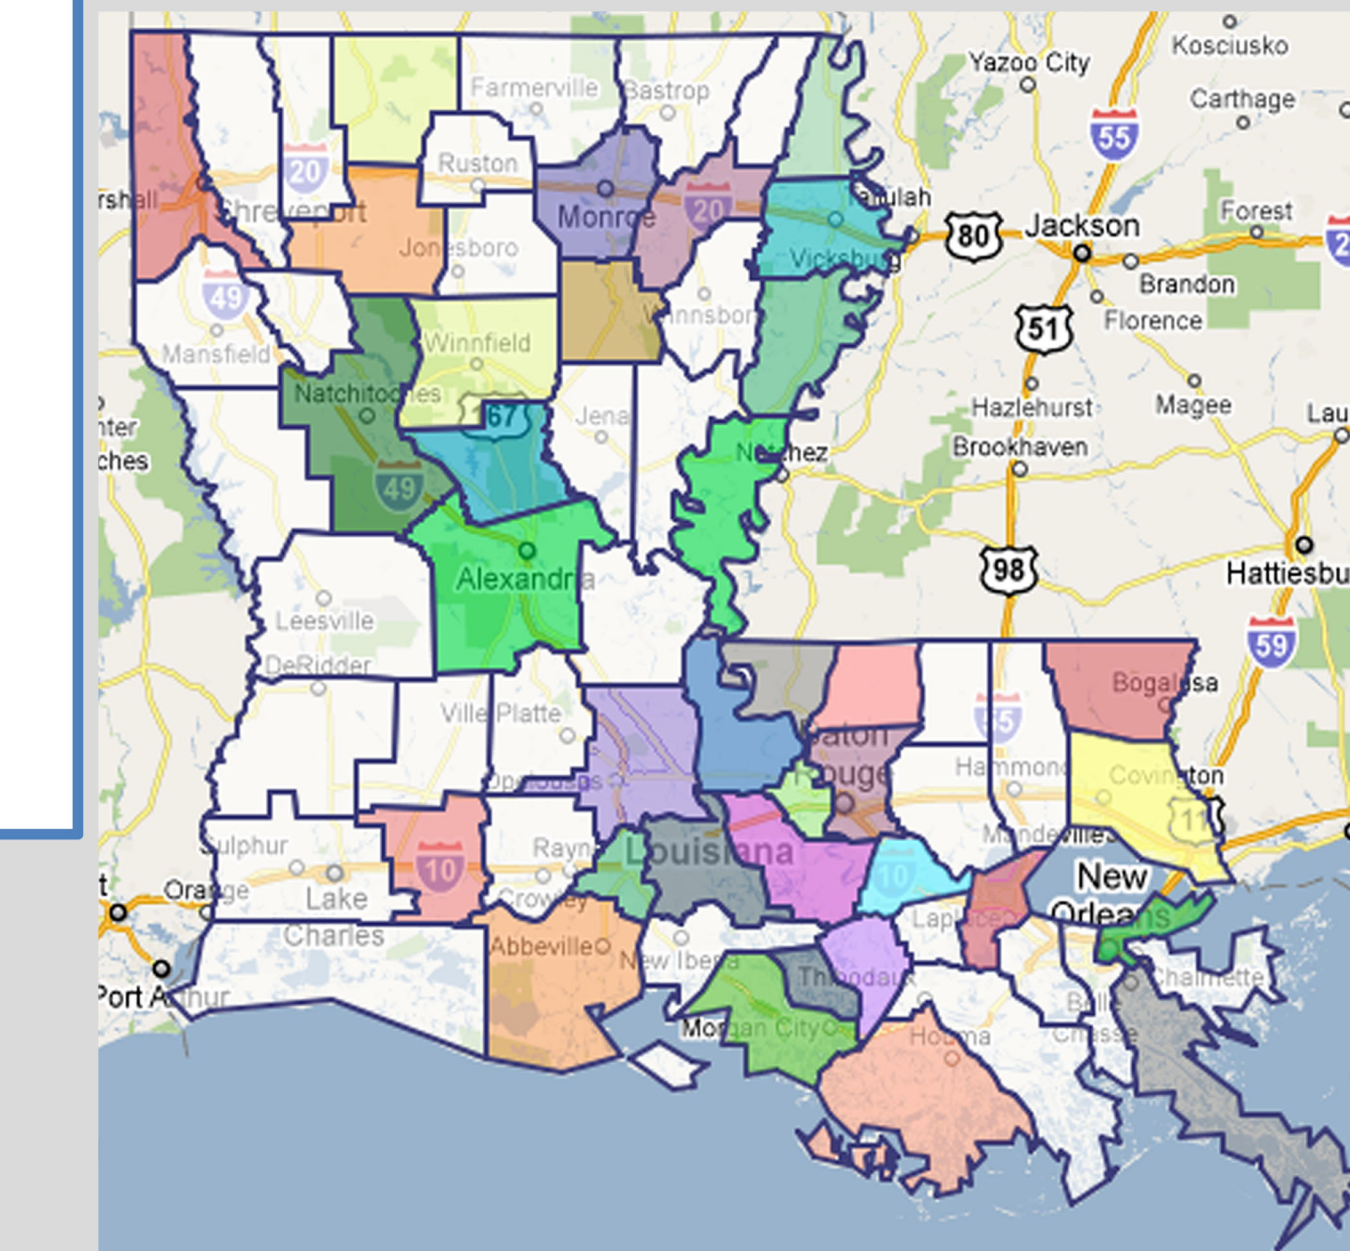

We performed an environmental scan of 27 state newspaper websites. This is some of the data we collected.

This information could inform further research or offer inspiration to new NDNP awardees who will soon build their own state newspaper sites.

How Access is Provided to Newspapers

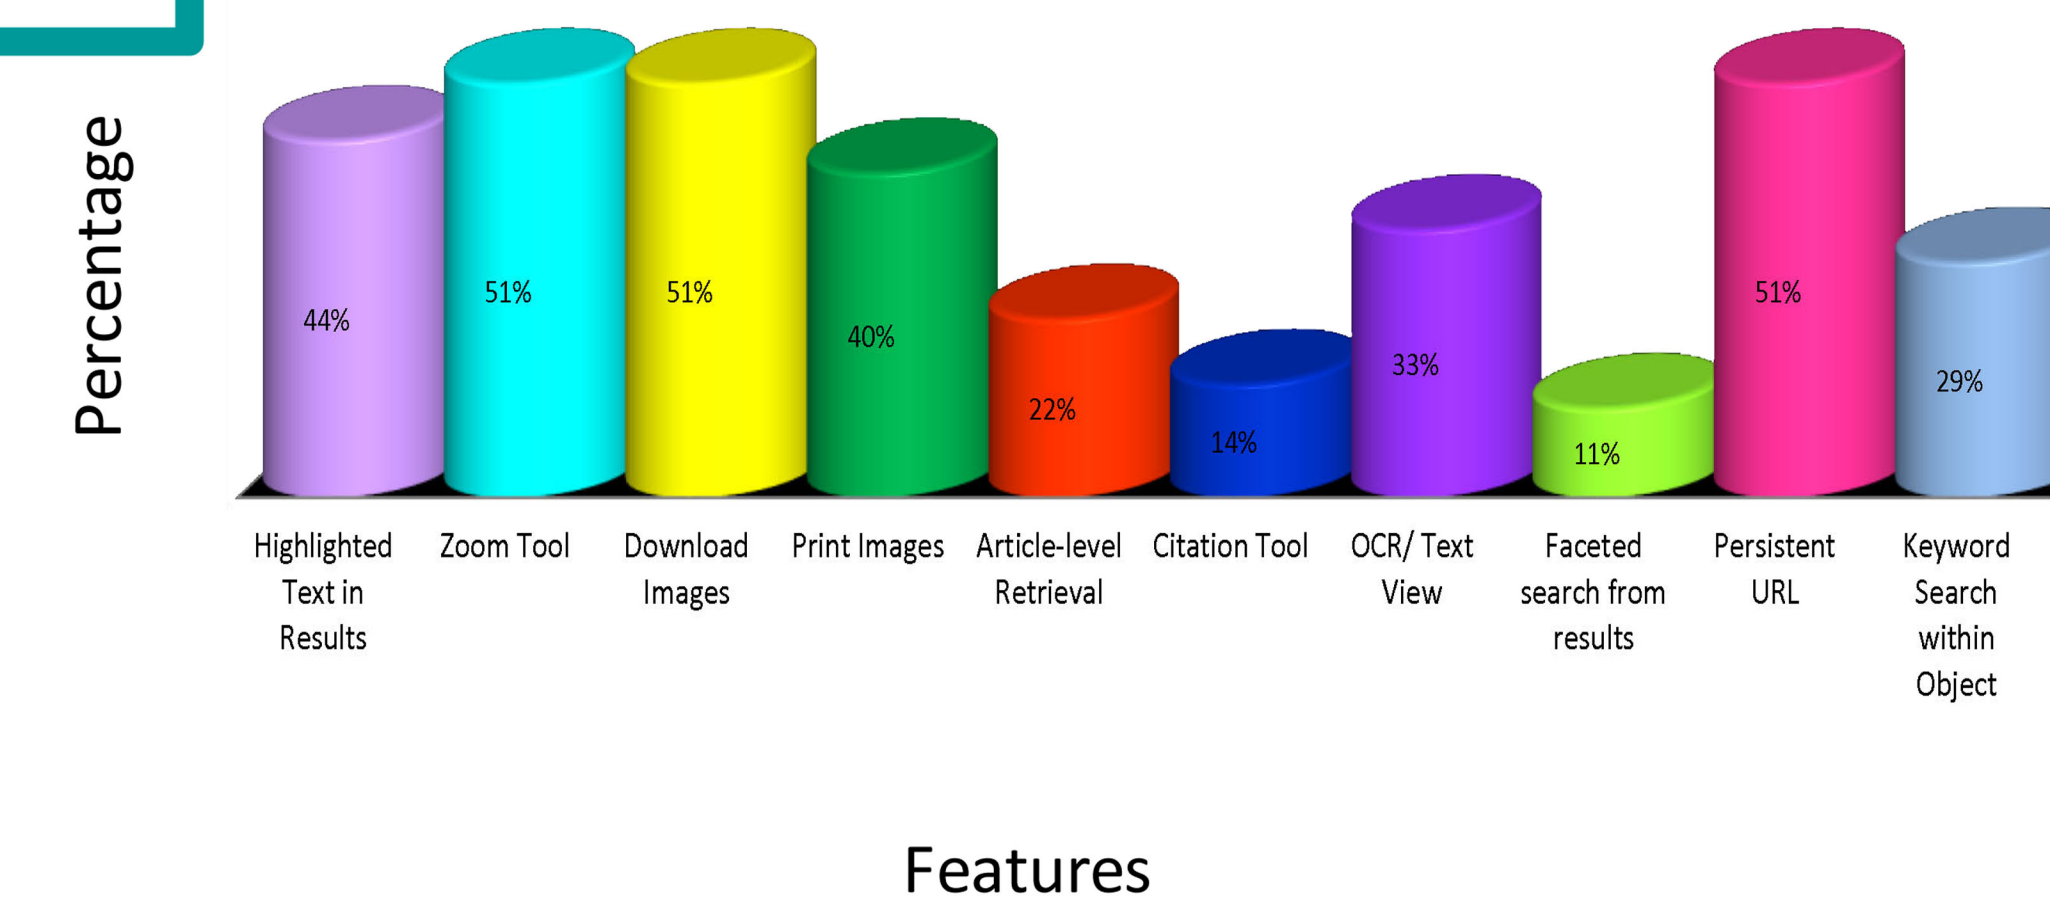

Users can search and browse newspapers through access points created on maps, calendars, lists of titles, locations, and subject terms.

Browse Louisiana newspapers through a map.

Search Result Features

Oregon uses the Library of Congress' Newspaper Viewer.

State projects offer enhancements like videos, blogs, slide shows, and advanced search strategies. Many offer teaching tools for educators.

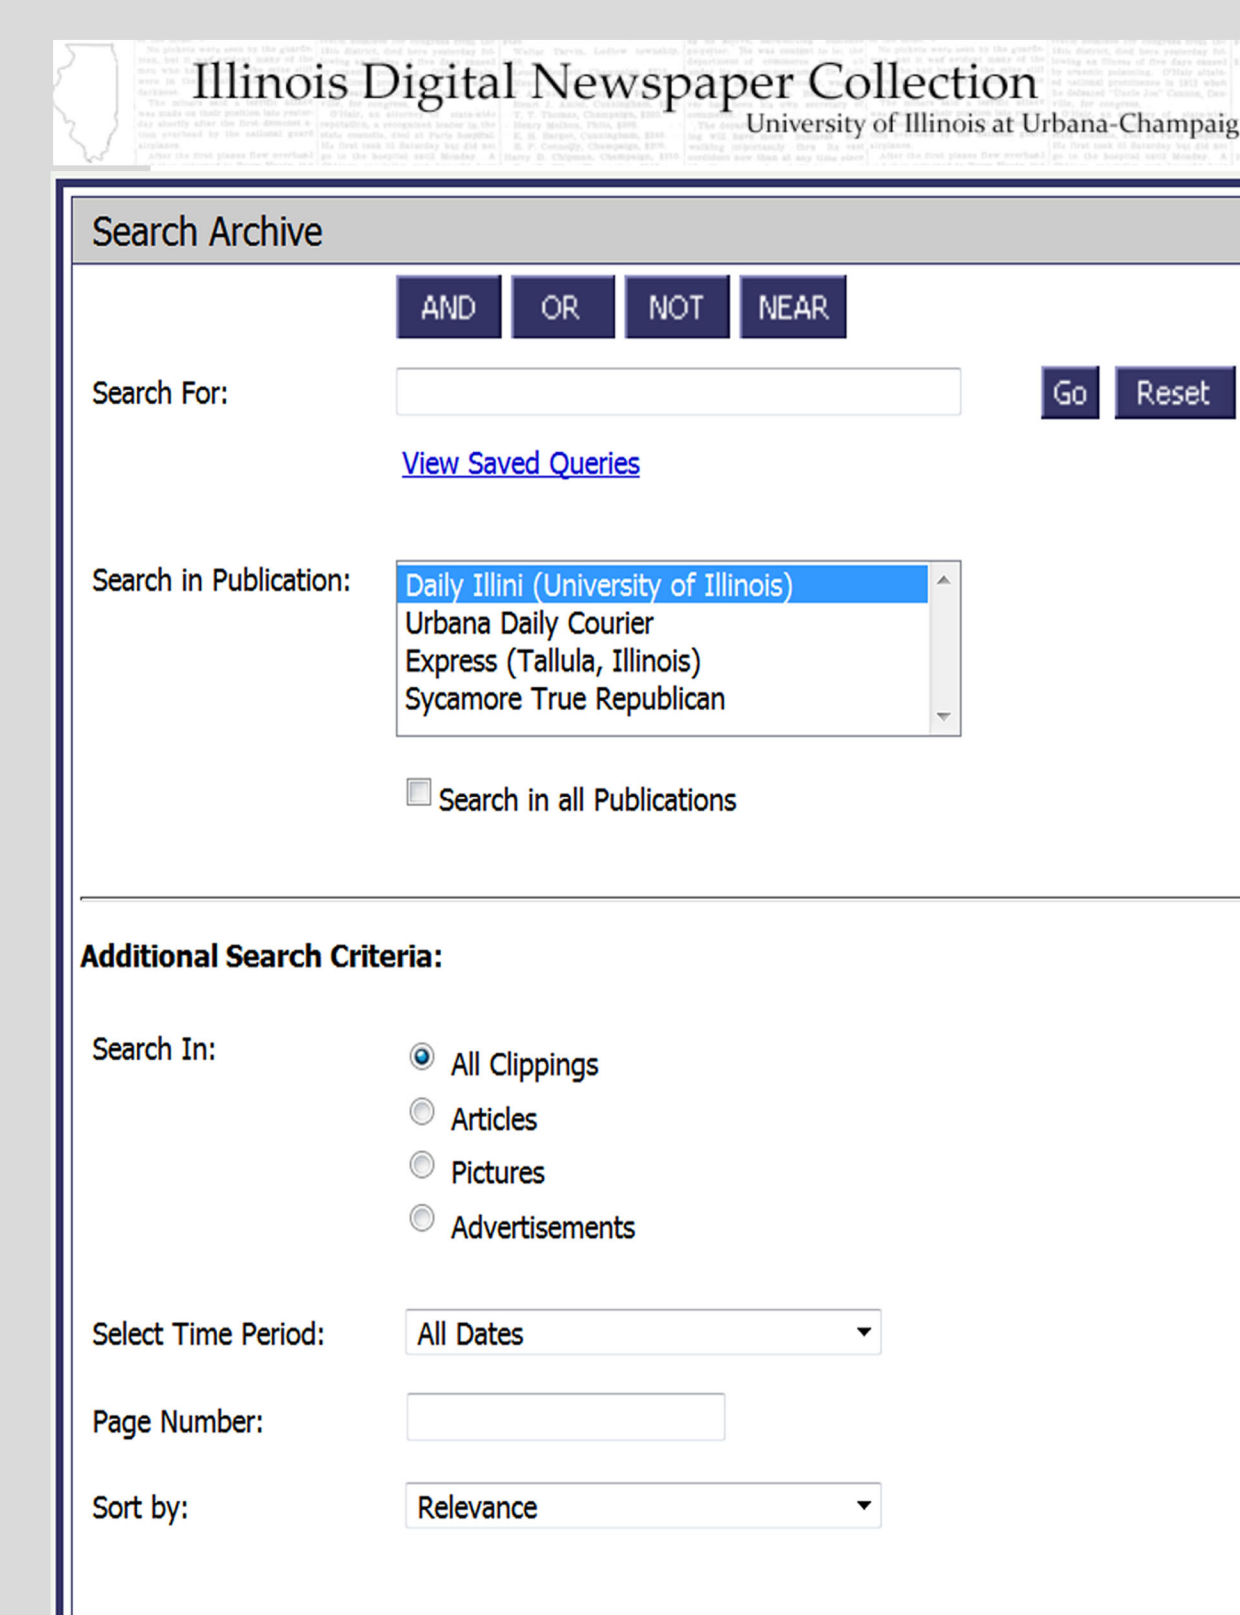

South Carolina features timelines highlighting important events.

In 2009, KY-NDNP produced a short film about our in-house newspaper digitization production process. It debuted later that year at Chronicing America's 1 million page celebration at NEH in Washington, DC. A humorous version of the same film can be seen on our YouTube channel.

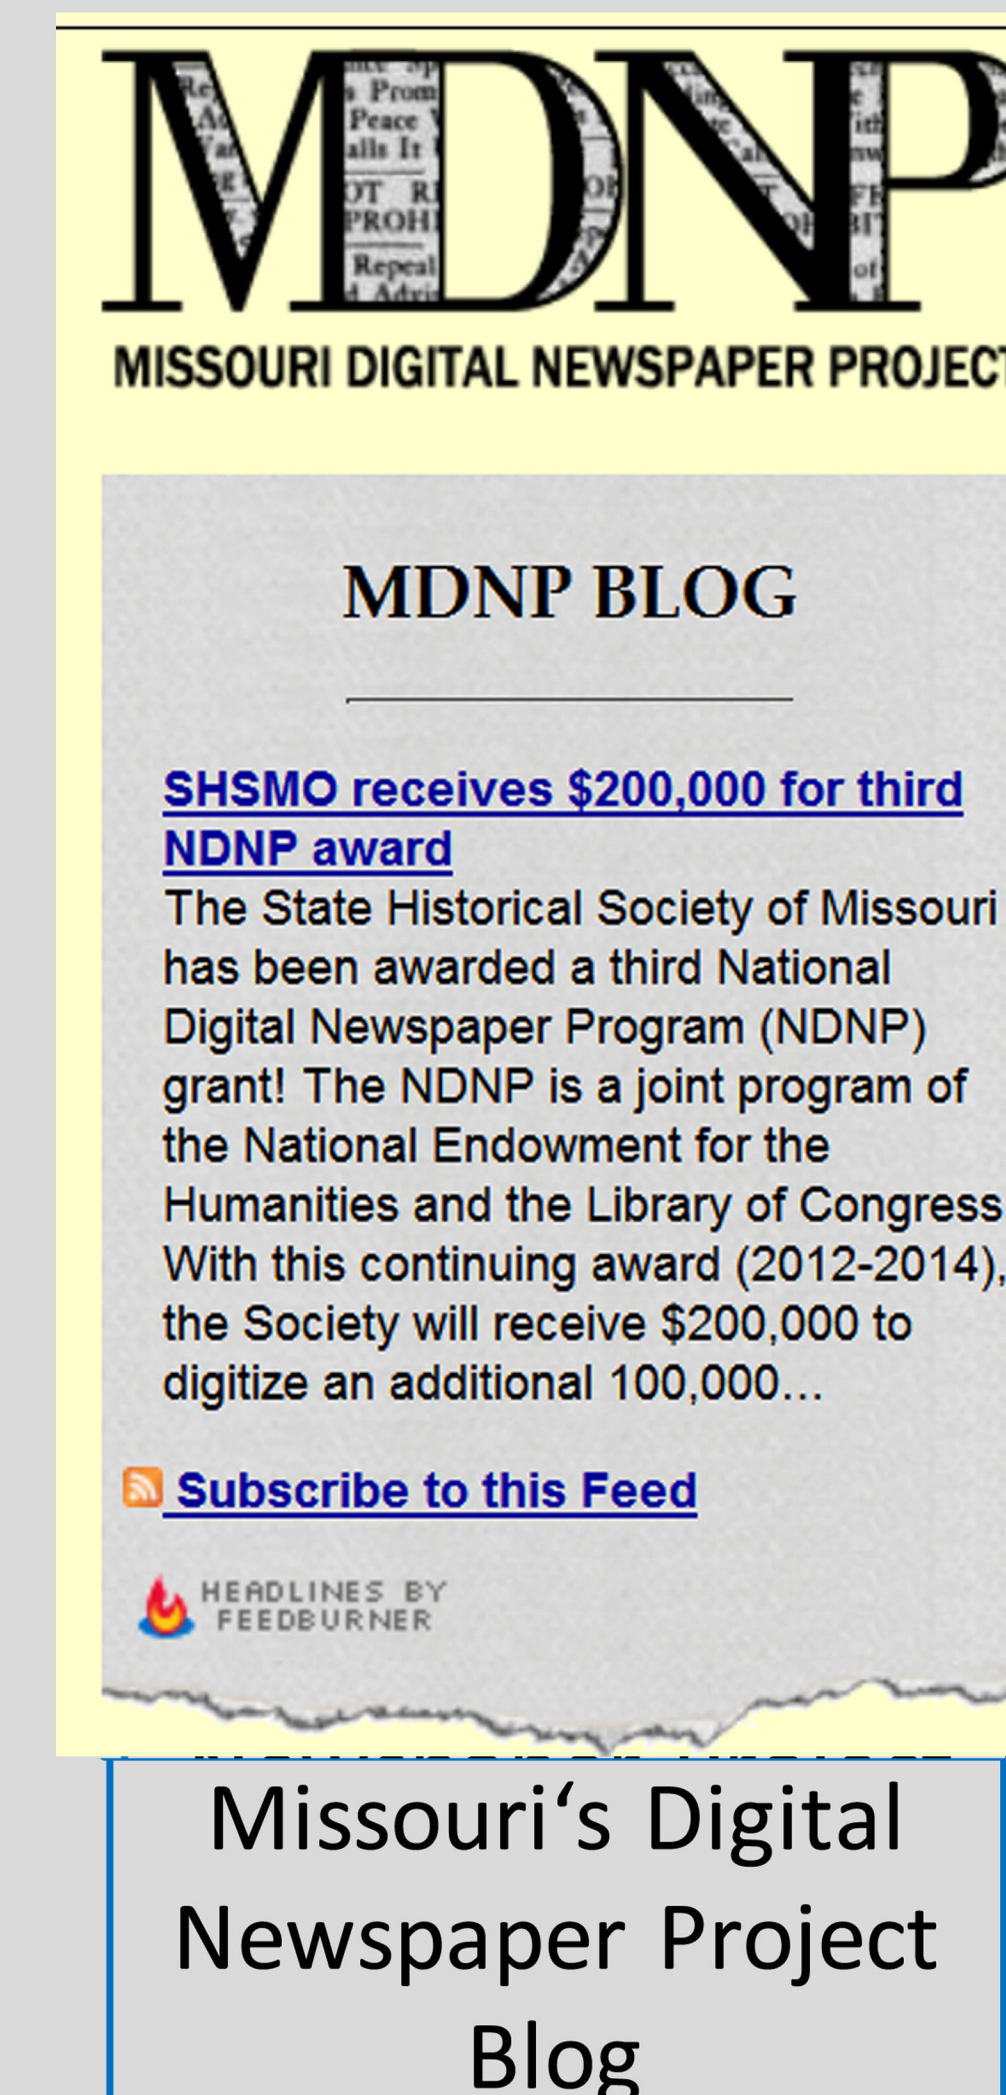

In June 2010, KY-NDNP Principle Investigator, Mary Molinaro, spoke with then University of Kentucky president, Dr. Lee T. Todd, about the historic newspaper digitization program UK Perspectives.

Kentucky's informational video teaches how they create digital newspaper projects.

Search clippings, articles, pictures, and ads separately from the Illinois state website.

Missouri's Digital Newspaper Project Blog

Site Features

Most awardees' sites offer NDNP content between 1836 and 1922. Many provide issues published after 1923. Some even include recent born-digital newspapers.