SECTION ___01. SHORT TITLE.

This title may be cited as the ''Emergency Imported Electric Power Price Reduction Act of 1999''.

SEC. ___02. FINDINGS AND PURPOSES.

(a) FINDINGS.—Congress finds that—

(1) the protection of the public health and welfare, the preservation of national security, and the regulation of interstate and foreign commerce require that electric power imported into the United States be priced fairly and competitively;

(2) the importation of electric power into the United States is a matter vested with the public interest that—

(A) involves an essential and extensively regulated infrastructure industry; and

(B) affects consumers, the cost of goods manufactured and services rendered, and the economic well-being and livelihood of individuals and society;

(3) it is essential that imported electric power be priced—

(A) in a manner that is competitive with domestic electric power and thereby contribute to robust and sound national and regional economies; and

(B) not at a rate that is so high as to result in the imminent bankruptcy of electric utilities in a State; and

(4) the purchase of imported electric power by the Vermont Joint Owners under the Firm Power and Energy Contract with Hydro-Quebec dated December 4, 1987—

(A) is not consistent with the findings stated in paragraphs (1), (2), and (3); and

(B) threatens the economic well-being of the States and regions in which the imported electric power is provided contrary to the public policy of the United States as set forth in the findings stated in paragraphs (1), (2), and (3).

(b) PURPOSES.—The purposes of this title are—

(1) to facilitate the public policy of the United States as set forth in the findings stated in paragraphs (1), (2), and (3) of subsection (a);

(2) to remove a serious threat to the economic well-being of the States and regions in which imported electric power is provided under the contract referred to in section ____02(a)(4); and

At the end of the bill, add the following new title:

TITLE XX—CONSUMER CREDIT DISCLOSURE

SEC. XX01. ENHANCED DISCLOSURES UNDER AN OPEN END CREDIT PLAN.

(a) MINIMUM PAYMENT DISCLOSURES.—Section 127(b) of the Truth in Lending Act (15 U.S.C. 1637(b)) is amended by adding at the end the following:

''(11)(A) In the case of an open end credit plan that requires a minimum monthly payment of not more than 4 percent of the balance on which finance charges are accruing, the following statement, located on the front of the billing statement, disclosed clearly and conspicuously, in typeface no smaller than the largest typeface used to make other clear and conspicuous disclosures under this subsection: ''Minimum Payment Warning: Making only the minimum payment will increase the interest you pay and the time it takes to repay your balance. For example, making only a 2% minimum monthly payment on a balance of $1,000 at an interest rate of 17% would take 88 months to repay the balance in full. For an estimate of the time it would take to repay your balance, making only minimum payments, call this toll-free number: XXXXXX. A creditor subject to this subparagraph (A) with total assets not exceeding $250 million and that is an insured depository institution as defined in Section 3(c)(2) of the Federal Deposit Insurance Act or a depository institution insured by the National Credit Union Share Insurance Fund shall not be required to provide a toll-free telephone number, but may instead recoup reasonable average costs of providing telephone information access to consumers.'.

''(B) In the case of an open end credit plan that requires a minimum monthly payment of more than 4 percent of the balance on which finance charges are accruing, the following statement, in a prominent location on the front of the billing statement, disclosed clearly and conspicuously, in typeface no smaller than the largest typeface used to make other clear and conspicuous disclosures under this subsection: 'Minimum Payment Warning: Making only the required minimum payment will increase the interest you pay and the time it takes to repay your balance. Making a 5% minimum monthly payment on a balance of $300 at an interest rate of 17% would take 24 months to repay the balance in full. For an estimate of the time it would take to repay your balance, making only minimum monthly payments, call this toll-free number: XXXXXX. A creditor subject to this subparagraph (B) with total assets not exceeding $250 million and that is an insured depository institution as defined in Section 3(c)(2) of the Federal Deposit Insurance Act or a depository institution insured by the National Credit Union Share Insurance Fund shall not be required to provide a toll-free telephone number, but may instead recoup reasonable average costs of providing telephone information access to consumers.'.

''(C) Notwithstanding subparagraphs (A) and (B), in the case of a creditor with respect to which compliance with this title is enforced by the Federal Trade Commission, the following statement, in a prominent location on the front of the billing statement, disclosed clearly and conspicuously, in typeface no smaller than the largest typeface used to make other clear and conspicuous disclosures under this subsection: 'Minimum Payment Warning: Making only the required minimum payment will increase the interest you pay and the time it takes to repay your balance. For example, making only a 5% minimum monthly payment on a balance of $300 at an interest rate of 17% would take 24 months to repay the balance in full. For an estimate of the time it would take to repay your balance, making only minimum monthly payments, call the Federal Trade Commission at this toll-free number: XXXXXX'.

''(D) Notwithstanding subparagraph (B) or (C), in complying with either such subparagraph, a creditor may substitute an example based on an interest rate that is greater than 17 percent. Any creditor who is subject to subparagraph (B) may elect to provide the disclosure required under subparagraph (A) in lieu of the disclosure required under subparagraph (B).

''(E) The Board shall, by rule, periodically recalculate, as necessary, the interest rate and repayment period under subparagraphs (A), (B), and (C).

''(F) The telephone number disclosed by a creditor or the Federal Trade Commission under subparagraph (A) or (B) or (G), as appropriate, may be a telephone number established and maintained by the creditor or the Federal Trade Commission, as appropriate, or may be a telephone number established and maintained by a third party for use by the creditor or multiple creditors, or the Federal Trade Commission, as appropriate. The telephone number may connect consumers to an automated device through which consumers may obtain information described in subparagraph (A), (B) or (C) by inputting information using a touch-tone telephone or similar device, if consumers whose telephones are not equipped to use such automated device are provided the opportunity to be connected to an individual from whom the information described in subparagraph (A), (B) or (C), as applicable, may be obtained. A person that receives a request for information described in subparagraph (A), (B) or (C) from an obligor through the telephone number disclosed under subparagraph (A), (B) or (C), as applicable, shall disclose in response to such request only the information set forth in the formula promulgated by the Board under subparagraph (H)(i).

''(G) The Federal Trade Commission shall establish and maintain a toll-free number for the purpose of providing to consumers the information required to be disclosed under subparagraph (C).

''(H) The Board shall—

''(i)(a) establish a formula for the computation of the approximate number of months that it would take to repay an outstanding balance and the approximate total cost to the consumer, including interest and principal payments, of paying that balance in full, if the consumer pays only the required minimum monthly payments and if no other advances are made; and (b) in establishing the formula required under (i)(a), the Board may use such data and assumptions as it deems necessary from time to time to carry out the purposes of this section.

''(ii) establish the formula required under clause (i) by assuming—

''(I) a significant number of different annual percentage rates;

''(II) a significant number of different account balances;

''(III) a significant number of different minimum payment amounts;

''(IV) that only minimum monthly payments are made and no additional extensions of credit are obtained;

''(V) one or more balance computation methods or one or more periods to be used as the number of days per billing cycle; and

''(VI) such other facts or data as the Board shall deem necessary to carry out the purposes of this section; and

''(iii) promulgate regulations that provide instructional guidance regarding the manner in which the information contained in the formula established under clause (i) should be used in responding to the request of an obligor for any information required to be disclosed under subparagraph (A), (B), or (C).''.

(b) EXCEPTION FOR CHARGE CARD ACCOUNTS.—The disclosure requirements under this section do not apply to a charge account, the primary purpose of which is to require payment of charges in full each month.

(c) EXCEPTION FOR ACTUAL DISCLOSURE.—Creditors that maintain a toll-free telephone number for the purpose of providing customers with the actual number of months that it would take to repay an outstanding balance are exempt from the requirements of paragraphs (11) (A) and (B).

(d) REGULATORY IMPLEMENTATION.—The Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System (hereafter in this Act referred to as the ''Board'') shall promulgate regulations implementing the requirements of section 127(b)(11) of the Truth in Lending Act, as added by subsection (a) of this section. Section 127(b)(11) of the Truth in Lending Act, as added by subsection (a) of this section, and the regulations issued under this subsection shall not take effect until the later of 18 months after the date of enactment of this Act or 12 months after the publication of such regulations by the Board.

(e) STUDY OF FINANCIAL DISCLOSURES.—

(1) IN GENERAL.—The Board may conduct a study to determine the types of information available to potential borrowers from consumer credit lending institutions regarding: factors qualifying potential borrowers for credit, repayment requirements, and the consequences of default.

(2) FACTORS FOR CONSIDERATION.—In conducting the study under paragraph (1), the Board may, in consultation with the other Federal banking agencies (as defined in Section 3 of the Federal Deposit Insurance Act), the National Credit Union Administration and the Federal Trade Commission, consider the extent to which—

(A) consumers, in establishing new credit arrangements, are aware of their existing payment obligations, the need to consider those obligations in deciding to take on new credit, and how taking on excessive credit can result in financial difficulty;

(B) minimum periodic payment features offered in connection with open end credit plans impact consumer default rates;

(C) consumers make only the minimum payment under open end credit plans;

(D) consumers are aware that making only minimum payments will increase the cost and repayment period of an open end credit obligation; and

(E) the availability of low minimum payment options is a cause of consumers experiencing financial difficulty.

(3) REPORT TO CONGRESS.—Before the end of the 2-year period beginning on the date of enactment of this Act, findings of the Board in connection with the study, if conducted, shall be submitted to Congress. Such report also shall include recommendations for legislative initiatives, if any, of the Board based upon its findings.

TITLE ____—EAST TIMOR SELF-DETERMINATION ACT OF 1999

SEC. ____01. SHORT TITLE.

This title may be cited as the ''East Timor Self-Determination Act of 1999''.

SEC. ____02. FINDINGS; PURPOSE; SENSE OF SENATE.

(a) CONGRESSIONAL FINDINGS.—

(1) On August 30, 1999, in accordance with the May 5, 1999, agreement between Indonesia and Portugal brokered by the United Nations, and subsequent agreements between the United Nations and the governments of Indonesia and Portugal, a popular consultation took place, in which 78.5 percent of East Timorese rejected integration with Indonesia, setting the stage for a transition to independence pursuant to the terms of the May 5, 1999, agreement.

(2) On October 19, 1999, the Indonesian People's Consultative Assembly agreed to ratify the August 30, 1999, vote results, leading the United Nations Security Council, on October 25, 1999, to authorize a United Nations Transitional Administration in East Timor (UNTAET), which was to include deployment of an international police and military force with up to 1,640 officers and 8,950 troops.

(3) The United Nations Commission on Human Rights, in a special session meeting on September 27, 1999, called on the United Nations Secretary General to establish an international commission of inquiry to investigate violations of human rights in East Timor, and urged the cooperation of the Indonesian government and military.

(4) The Secretary General subsequently directed Mary Robinson, the United Nations High Commissioner on Human Rights, to appoint a United Nations commission on October 15, 1999, which is due to report its conclusion to the Secretary General by December 31, 1999.

(5) The Indonesian People's Consultative Assembly on October 20, 1999, chose Abdurrahman Wahid as President of the Republic of Indonesia and the next day also chose as Vice President, Megawati Soekarnoputri

(6) President Wahid has invited Xanana Gusmao to meet and has written to the United Nations Secretary General officially informing him of the decision to end Indonesia's administration of East Timor, and of East Timor's independence, and expressing his hope ''that East Timor will become an independent state''.

(7) As of late October 1999, according to United Nations officials and other independent observers, more than 200,000 East Timorese remain displaced in camps in West Timor and elsewhere in Indonesia, under constant threat by civilian militia and in some cases denied access to assistance by the United Nations humanitarian agencies.

(b) SENSE OF THE SENATE.—It is the sense of the Senate that—

(1) the United States should congratulate the people of Indonesia on its democratic transition and welcome the efforts of the new Indonesian government to bring a peaceful end to the crisis in East and West Timor;

(2) the results of the August 30, 1999, vote on East Timor's political status, which expressed the will of a majority of the Timorese people, should be fully implemented;

(3) economic recovery in Indonesia is essential to political and economic stability in the region; and

(4) the President, the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, and Congress should work with the people of Indonesia to restore Indonesia's economic vitality.

(c) PURPOSE.—The purpose of this Act is to encourage the government of Indonesia and the armed forces of Indonesia to take such additional steps as are necessary to create a peaceful environment in which the United Nations Assistance Mission to East Timor (UNAMET), the International Force for East Timor (INTERFET), and the United Nations Transitional Administration in East Timor (UNTAET) can fulfill their mandates and implement the results of the August 30, 1999, vote on East Timor's political status.

''(ii) such other methods are adequate to reasonably inform plan participants who are applicable individuals of the impact of the reductions,

''(B) reduce the advance notice period in paragraph (1)(A) from 45 days to 15 days before the effective date of the amendment for cases in which compliance with the 45-day advance notice requirement would be unduly burdensome because the amendment is contingent on a merger, acquisition, disposition, or other similar transaction involving plan participants who are applicable individuals or because 45 days advance notice is otherwise impracticable,

''(C) permit the comparison of benefits under paragraph (3)(B)(i) to be based on a form of payment other than a life annuity, or

''(B) who requests in writing such a statement from such administrator.

''(2) The statement described in this paragraph is a statement which provides information which is substantially the same as the information in the illustrative examples described in section 204(h)(3)(B) but which is based on data specific to the requesting individual and, if the individual so requests, information as of 1 other future date not included in such examples.

''(3) Paragraph (1) shall apply only to requests made during the 12-month period that begins on the later of the effective date of the amendment to which it relates or the date the notice described in section 204(h)(2) is provided. In no case shall an individual be entitled under this subsection to receive more than one such statement with respect to an amendment.

Such examples shall be prepared by the plan administrator in accordance with regulations prescribed by the Secretary, and such regulations shall require that the examples—

''(i) reflect fairly the different categories of applicable individuals who are similarly affected by the plan amendment after consideration of all relevant factors,

''(ii) show a comparison of benefits for each such category of applicable individuals under the plan (as in effect before and after the effective date) at appropriate future dates, and

''(iii) illustrate any temporary period described in subparagraph (A)(ii).

Such comparison shall be based on benefits in the form of a life annuity and on actuarial assumptions each of which is reasonable (and is so certified by an enrolled actuary) when applied to all participants in the plan.

''(4) SUPPORTING INFORMATION RELATING TO CALCULATION OF BENEFITS.—

''(A) IN GENERAL.—Each individual who receives or who is entitled to receive the information described in paragraph (3) may (after so receiving or becoming so entitled) request the plan administrator to provide the information described in subparagraph (B).

''(ii) to enable the individual to use the individual's own personal information to make calculations of the individual's own benefits which are similar to the calculations made in such examples.

Nothing in this subsection shall be construed to require the plan administrator to provide to an individual such individual's personal information for purposes of clause (ii).

''(ii) such other methods are adequate to reasonably inform plan participants who are applicable individuals of the impact of the reductions,

''(B) reduce the advance notice period in paragraph (1)(A) from 45 days to 15 days before the effective date of the amendment for cases in which compliance with the 45-day advance notice requirement would be unduly burdensome because the amendment is contingent on a merger, acquisition, disposition, or other similar transaction involving plan participants who are applicable individuals or because 45 days advance notice is otherwise impracticable,

''(C) permit the comparison of benefits under paragraph (3)(B)(i) to be based on a form of payment other than a life annuity, or

''(1) IN GENERAL.—In determining liability for any tax under subtitle A, noneconomic tax attributes shall not be allowed.

''(2) NONECONOMIC TAX ATTRIBUTE.—For purposes of this subsection, a noneconomic tax attribute is any deduction, loss, or credit claimed to result from any transaction unless—

''(A) the transaction changes in a meaningful way (apart from Federal income tax consequences) the taxpayer's economic position, and

''(B)(i) the present value of the reasonably expected potential income from the transaction (and the taxpayer's risk of loss from the transaction) are substantial in relationship to the present value of the tax benefits claimed, or

''(ii) in the case of a transaction which is in substance the borrowing of money or the acquisition of financial capital, the deductions claimed with respect to the transaction for any period are not significantly in excess of the economic return for such period realized by the person lending the money or providing the financial capital.

''(3) PRESUMPTION OF NONECONOMIC TAX ATTRIBUTES.—For purposes of paragraph (2), the following factors shall give rise to a presumption that a transaction fails to meet the requirements of paragraph (2):

''(A) The fact that the payments, liabilities, or assets that purport to create a loss (or other benefit) for tax purposes are not reflected to any meaningful extent on the taxpayer's books and records for financial reporting purposes.

''(B) The fact that the transaction results in an allocation of income or gain to a tax-indifferent party which is substantially in excess of such party's economic income or gain from the transaction.

''(4) TREATMENT OF BUILT-IN LOSS.—The determination of whether a transaction results in the realization of a built-in loss shall be made under subtitle A as if this subsection had not been enacted. For purposes of the preceding sentence, the term 'built-in loss' means any loss or deduction to the extent that such loss or deduction had economically been incurred before such transaction is entered into and to the extent that the loss or deduction was economically borne by the taxpayer.

''(5) DEFINITION AND SPECIAL RULES.—For purposes of this subsection—

''(A) TAX-INDIFFERENT PARTY.—The term 'tax-indifferent party' means any person or entity exempt from tax under subtitle A. A person shall be treated as a tax-indifferent party with respect to a transaction if, by reason of such person's method of accounting, the items taken into account with respect to the transaction have no substantial impact on such person's liability under subtitle A.

''(B) SERIES OF RELATED TRANSACTION.—A transaction which is part of a series of related transactions shall be treated as meeting the requirements of paragraph (2) only if—

''(i) such transaction meets such requirements without regard to the other transactions, and

''(ii) such transactions, if treated as 1 transaction, would meet such requirements. A similar rule shall apply to a multiple step transaction with each step being treated as a separate related transaction.

''(C) NORMAL BUSINESS TRANSACTIONS.—In the case of a transaction which is an integral part of a taxpayer's trade or business and which is entered into in the normal course of such trade or business, the determination of the potential income from such transaction shall be made by taking into account its relationship to the overall trade or business of the taxpayer.

''(D) TREATMENT OF FEES.—In determining whether there is risk of loss from a transaction (and the amount thereof), potential loss of fees and other transaction expenses shall be disregarded.

''(E) TREATMENT OF ECONOMIC RETURN ENHANCEMENTS.—The following shall be treated as economic returns and not tax benefits:

''(i) The credit under section 29 (relating to credit for producing fuel from a nonconventional source).

''(ii) The credit under section 42 (relating to low-income housing credit).

''(iii) The credit under section 45 (relating to electricity produced from certain renewable resources).

''(iv) The credit under section 1397E (relating to credit to holders of qualified zone academy bonds) or any similar program hereafter enacted.

''(v) Any other tax benefit specified in regulations.

''(F) EXCEPTIONS FOR NONBUSINESS TRANSACTIONS.—

''(i) INDIVIDUALS.—In the case of an individual, this subsection shall only apply to transactions entered into in connection with a trade or business or activity engaged in for profit.

''(ii) CHARITABLE TRANSFERS.—This subsection shall not apply in determining the amount allowable as a deduction under section 170, 545(b)(2), 556(b)(2), or 642(c).

''(6) ECONOMIC SUBSTANCE DOCTRINE, ETC., NOT AFFECTED.—The provisions of this subsection shall not be construed as altering or supplanting any rule of law referred to in section 6662(i)(2)(B) and the requirements of this subsection shall be construed as being in addition to any such rule of law.''

(b) INCREASE IN SUBSTANTIAL UNDERPAYMENT PENALTY WITH RESPECT TO DISALLOWED NONECONOMIC TAX ATTRIBUTES.—Section 6662 (relating to imposition of accuracy-related penalty) is amended by adding at the end the following new subsection:

''(i) INCREASE IN PENALTY IN CASE OF DISALLOWED NONECONOMIC TAX ATTRIBUTES.—

''(1) IN GENERAL.—In the case of the portion of the underpayment to which this subsection applies—

''(A) subsection (a) shall be applied with respect to such portion by substituting '40 percent' for '20 percent', and

''(B) subsection (d)(2)(B) and section 6664(c) shall not apply.

''(2) UNDERPAYMENTS TO WHICH SUBSECTION APPLIES.—This subsection shall apply to an underpayment to which this section applies by reason of paragraph (1) or (2) of subsection (b) to the extent that such underpayment is attributable to—

''(A) the disallowance of any noneconomic tax attribute (determined under section 7701(m)), or

''(B) the disallowance of any other benefit—

''(i) because of a lack of economic substance or business purpose for the transaction giving rise to the claimed benefit,

''(ii) because the form of the transaction did not reflect its substance, or

''(iii) because of any other similar rule of law.

''(3) INCREASE IN PENALTY NOT TO APPLY IF COMPLIANCE WITH DISCLOSURE REQUIREMENTS.—Paragraph (1)(A) shall not apply if the taxpayer—

''(A) discloses to the Secretary within 30 days after the closing of the transaction appropriate documents describing the transaction, and

''(B) files with the taxpayer's return of tax imposed by subtitle A—

''(i) a statement verifying that such disclosure has been made,

''(ii) a detailed description of the facts, assumptions of facts, and factual conclusions with respect to the business or economic purposes or objectives of the transaction that are relied upon to support the manner in which it is reported on the return,

''(iii) a description of the due diligence performed to ascertain the accuracy of such facts, assumptions, and factual conclusions,

''(iv)(I) a statement (signed by the senior financial officer of the corporation under penalty of perjury) that the facts, assumptions, or factual conclusions relied upon in reporting the transaction are true and correct as of the date the return is filed, to the best of such officer's knowledge and belief, and

''(II) if the actual facts varied materially from the facts, assumptions, or factual conclusions relied upon, a statement describing such variances,

''(v) copies of any written material provided in connection with the offer of the transaction to the taxpayer by a third party,

''(vi) a full description of any express or implied agreement or arrangement with any advisor, or with any offeror, that the fee payable to such person would be contingent or subject to possible reimbursement, and

''(vii) a full description of any express or implied warranty from any person with respect to the anticipated tax results from the transaction.''

(c) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendments made by this section shall apply to transactions after the date of the enactment of this Act.

WELLSTONE (AND OTHERS) AMENDMENT NO. 2752

(Ordered to lie on the table.)

Mr. WELLSTONE (for himself, Mr. DASCHLE, Mr. DORGAN, and Mr. HARKIN) submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by them to the bill, S. 625, supra; as follows:

At the end insert the following:

DIVISION 2—AGRIBUSINESS MERGER MORATORIUM AND ANTITRUST REVIEW ACT OF 1999

SEC. ___1. SHORT TITLE.

This division may be cited as the ''Agribusiness Merger Moratorium and Antitrust Review Act of 1999''.

SEC. ___2. FINDINGS.

Congress finds the following:

(1) Concentration in the agricultural economy including mergers, acquisitions, and other combinations and alliances among suppliers, producers, packers, other food processors, and distributors has been accelerating at a rapid pace in the 1990's.

(2) The trend toward greater concentration in agriculture has important and far-reaching implications not only for family-based farmers, but also for the food we eat, the communities we live in, and the integrity of the natural environment upon which we all depend.

(3) In the past decade and a half, the top 4 largest pork packers have seized control of some 57 percent of the market, up from 36 percent. Over the same period, the top 4 beef packers have expanded their market share from 32 percent to 80 percent, the top 4 flour millers have increased their market share from 40 percent to 62 percent, and the market share of the top 4 soybean crushers has jumped from 54 percent to 80 percent.

(4) Today the top 4 sheep, poultry, wet corn, and dry corn processors now control 73 percent, 55 percent, 74 percent, and 57 percent of the market, respectively.

(5) A handful of firms dominate the processing of every major commodity. Many of them are vertically integrated, which means that they control successive stages of the food chain, from inputs to production to distribution.

(6) Growing concentration of the agricultural sector has restricted choices for farmers trying to sell their products. As the bargaining power of agribusiness firms over farmers increases, agricultural commodity markets are becoming stacked against the farmer.

(7) The farmer's share of every retail dollar has plummeted from around 50 percent in 1952, to less than 25 percent today, while the profit share for farm input, marketing, and processing companies has risen.

(8) While agribusiness conglomerates are posting record earnings, farmers are facing desperate times. The commodity price index is the lowest since 1987. Hog prices are at their lowest since 1972. Cotton and soybean prices are the lowest they have been since the early 1970's.

(9) The benefits of low commodity prices are not being passed on to American consumers. The gap between what shoppers pay for food and what farmers are paid is growing wider. From 1984 to 1998, prices paid to farmers fell 36 percent, while consumer food prices actually increased by 3 percent.

(10) Concentration, low prices, anticompetitive practices, and other manipulations and abuses of the agricultural economy are driving family-based farmers out of business. Farmers are going bankrupt or giving up, and few are taking their places; more farm families are having to rely on other jobs to stay afloat; and the number of farmers leaving the land will continue to increase unless and until these trends are reversed.

(11) The decline of family-based agriculture undermines the economies of rural communities across America; it has pushed Main Street businesses, from equipment suppliers to insurance sales people, out of business or to the brink of insolvency.

(12) Increased concentration in the agribusiness sector has a harmful effect on the environment; corporate hog farming, for example, threatens the integrity of local water supplies and creates noxious odors in neighboring communities. Concentration also can increase the risks to food safety and limit the biodiversity of plants and animals.

(13) The decline of family-based farming poses a direct threat to American families and family values, by subjecting farm families to turmoil and stress.

(14) The decline of family-based farming causes the demise of rural communities, as stores lose customers, churches lose congregations, schools and clinics become under-used, career opportunities for young people dry up, and local inequalities of wealth and income grow wider.

(15) These developments are not the result of inevitable market forces. They are the consequence of policies made in Washington, including farm, antitrust, and trade policies.

(16) To restore competition in the agricultural economy, and to increase the bargaining power and enhance economic prospects for family-based farmers, the trend toward concentration must be reversed.

(2) by redesignating paragraphs (1) through (3) as subparagraphs (A) through (C), respectively;

(3) by inserting ''(1)'' after ''(g)'';

(4) by striking ''Practitioners who dispense'' and inserting ''Except as provided in paragraph (2), practitioners who dispense and prescribe''; and

(5) by adding at the end the following:

''(2)(A) Subject to subparagraphs (D), the requirements of paragraph (1) are waived in the case of the dispensing or prescribing, by a physician, of narcotic drugs in schedule III, IV, or V, or combinations of such drugs, if the physician meets the conditions specified in subparagraph (B) and the narcotic drugs or combinations of such drugs meet the conditions specified in subparagraph (C).

''(B)(i) For purposes of subparagraph (A), the conditions specified in this subparagraph with respect to a physician are that, before dispensing or prescribing narcotic drugs in schedule III, IV, or V, or combinations of such drugs, to patients for maintenance or detoxification treatment, the physician submit to the Secretary and the Attorney General a notification of the intent of the physician to begin dispensing or prescribing the drugs or combinations for such purpose, and that the notification to the Secretary also contain the following certifications by the physician:

''(I) The physician—

''(aa) is a physician licensed under State law; and

''(bb) has training or experience and the ability to treat and manage opiate-dependent patients.

''(II) With respect to patients to whom the physician will provide such drugs or combinations of drugs, the physician has the capacity to refer the patients for appropriate counseling and other appropriate ancillary services.

''(III) In any case in which the physician is not in a group practice, the total number of such patients of the physician at any one time will not exceed the applicable number. For purposes of this subclause, the applicable number is 20, except that the Secretary may by regulation change such total number.

''(IV) In any case in which the physician is in a group practice, the total number of such patients of the group practice at any one time will not exceed the applicable number. For purposes of this subclause, the applicable number is 20, except that the Secretary may by regulation change such total number, and the Secretary for such purposes may by regulation establish different categories on the basis of the number of physicians in a group practice and establish for the various categories different numerical limitations on the number of such patients that the group practice may have.

''(ii)(I) The Secretary may, in consultation with the Administrator of the Drug Enforcement Administration, the Administrator of the Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration, the Director of the Center for Substance Abuse Treatment, the Director of the National Institute on Drug Abuse, and the Commissioner of Food and Drugs, issue regulations through notice and comment rulemaking or practice guidelines to implement this paragraph. The regulations or practice guidelines shall address the following:

''(aa) Approval of additional credentialing bodies and the responsibilities of credentialing bodies.

''(bb) Additional exemptions from the requirements of this paragraph and any regulations under this paragraph.

''(II) Nothing in the regulations or practice guidelines under this clause may authorize any Federal official or employee to exercise supervision or control over the practice of medicine or the manner in which medical services are provided.

''(III)(aa) The Secretary shall issue a Treatment Improvement Protocol containing best practice guidelines for the treatment and maintenance of opiate-dependent patients. The Secretary shall develop the protocol in consultation with the Director of the National Institute on Drug Abuse, the Director of the Center for Substance Abuse Treatment, the Administrator of the Drug Enforcement Administration, the Commissioner of Food and Drugs, the Administrator of the Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration, and other substance abuse disorder professionals. The protocol shall be guided by science.

''(bb) The protocol shall be issued not later than 120 days after the date of the enactment of the Methamphetamine Anti-Proliferation Act of 1999.

''(IV) For purposes of the regulations or practice guidelines under subclause (I), a physician shall have training or experience under clause (i)(I)(bb) if the physician meets one or more of the following conditions:

''(aa) The physician is certified in addiction treatment by the American Society of Addiction Medicine, the American Board of Medical Specialties, the American Osteopathic Academy of Addiction Medicine, or any other certified body accredited by the Secretary.

''(bb) The physician has been a clinical investigator in a clinical trial conducted for purposes of securing approval under section 505 of the Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act (21 U.S.C. 355) or section 351 of the Public Health Service Act (42 U.S.C. 262) of a narcotic drug in schedule III, IV, or V for the treatment of addiction, if such approval was granted.

''(cc) The physician has completed training (through classroom situations, seminars, professional society meetings, electronic communications, or otherwise) provided by the American Society of Addiction Medicine, the American Academy of Addiction Psychiatry, the American Osteopathic Academy of Addiction Medicine, the American Medical Association, the American Osteopathic Association, the American Psychiatric Association, or any other organization that the Secretary determines appropriate for purposes of this item. The curricula may include training in patient need for counseling regarding HIV, Hepatitis C, and other infectious diseases, substance abuse counseling, random drug testing, medical evaluation, annual assessment, prenatal care, diagnosis of addiction, rehabilitation services, confidentiality, and other appropriate topics.

''(dd) The physician has training or experience in the treatment and management of opiate-dependent, which training or experience shall meet such criteria as the Secretary may prescribe. Any such criteria shall be effective for a period of three years after the effective date of such criteria, but the Secretary may extend the effective period of such criteria by additional periods of three years for each extension if the Secretary determines that such extension is appropriate for purposes of this item. Any such extension shall go into effect only if the Secretary publishes a notice of such extension in the Federal Register during the 30-day period ending on the date of the end of the three-year effective period of such criteria to which such extension will apply.

''(ee) The physician is certified in addiction treatment by a State medical licensing board, or an entity accredited by such board, unless the Secretary determines (after an opportunity for a hearing) that the training provided by such board or entity was inadequate for the treatment and management of opiate-dependent patients.

''(C) For purposes of subparagraph (A), the conditions specified in this subparagraph with respect to narcotic drugs in schedule III, IV, or V, or combinations of such drugs, are as follows:

''(i) The drugs or combinations of drugs have, under the Federal Food, Drug and Cosmetic Act or section 351 of the Public Health Service Act, been approved for use in maintenance or detoxification treatment.

''(ii) The drugs or combinations of drugs have not been the subject of an adverse determination. For purposes of this clause, an adverse determination is a determination published in the Federal Register and made by the Secretary, after consultation with the Attorney General, that experience since the approval of the drug or combinations of drugs has shown that the use of the drugs or combinations of drugs for maintenance or detoxification treatment requires additional standards respecting the qualifications of physicians to provide such treatment, or requires standards respecting the quantities of the drugs that may be provided for unsupervised use.

''(D)(i) A waiver under subparagraph (A) with respect to a physician is not in effect unless (in addition to conditions under subparagraphs (B) and (C)) the following conditions are met:

''(I) The notification under subparagraph (B) is in writing and states the name of the physician.

''(II) The notification identifies the registration issued for the physician pursuant to subsection (f).

''(III) If the physician is a member of a group practice, the notification states the names of the other physicians in the practice and identifies the registrations issued for the other physicians pursuant to subsection (f).

''(IV) A period of 45 days has elapsed after the date on which the notification was submitted, and during such period the physician does not receive from the Secretary a written notice that one or more of the conditions specified in subparagraph (B), subparagraph (C), or this subparagraph, have not been met.

''(ii) The Secretary shall provide to the Attorney General such information contained in notifications under subparagraph (B) as the Attorney General may request.

''(E) If in violation of subparagraph (A) a physician dispenses or prescribes narcotic drugs in schedule III, IV, or V, or combinations of such drugs, for maintenance treatment or detoxification treatment, the Attorney General may, for purposes of section 304(a)(4), consider the physician to have committed an act that renders the registration of the physician pursuant to subsection (f) to be inconsistent with the public interest.

''(F)(i) Upon determining that a physician meets the conditions specified in subparagraph (B), the Secretary shall notify the physician and the Attorney General.

''(ii) Upon receiving notice with respect to a physician under clause (i), the Attorney General shall assign the physician an identification number under this paragraph for inclusion with the physician's current registration to prescribe narcotics. An identification number assigned a physician under this clause shall be appropriate to preserve the confidentiality of a patient prescribed narcotic drugs covered by this paragraph by the physician.

''(iii) If the Secretary fails to make a determination described in clause (i) by the end of the 45-day period beginning on the date of the receipt by the Secretary of a notification from a physician under subparagraph (B), the Attorney General shall assign the physician an identification number described in clause (ii) at the end of such period.

''(G) In this paragraph:

''(i) The term 'group practice' has the meaning given such term in section 1877(h)(4) of the Social Security Act.

''(ii) The term 'physician' has the meaning given such term in section 1861(r) of the Social Security Act.

''(ii) For the purposes relating to clause (iii), the Secretary and the Attorney General shall, during the 3-year period beginning on the date of the enactment of the Methamphetamine Anti-Proliferation Act of 1999, make determinations in accordance with the following:

''(I)(aa) The Secretary shall—

''(bbb) make a determination regarding whether such waivers have significantly increased (relative to the beginning of such period) the availability of maintenance treatment and detoxification treatment; and

''(ccc) make a determination regarding whether such waivers have adverse consequences for the public health.

''(bb) In making determinations under this subclause, the Secretary—

''(aaa) may collect data from the practitioners for whom waivers under subparagraph (A) are in effect;

''(bbb) shall issue appropriate guidelines or regulations (in accordance with procedures for substantive rules under section 553 of title 5, United States Code) specifying the scope of the data that will be required to be provided under this subclause and the means through which the data will be collected; and

''(ccc) shall, with respect to collecting such data, comply with applicable provisions of chapter 6 of title 5, United States Code (relating to a regulatory flexibility analysis), and of chapter 8 of such title (relating to congressional review of agency rulemaking).

''(II) The Attorney General shall—

''(aa) make a determination of the extent to which there have been violations of the numerical limitations established under subparagraph (B) for the number of individuals to whom a practitioner may provide treatment; and

''(bb) make a determination regarding whether waivers under subparagraph (A) have increased (relative to the beginning of such period) the extent to which narcotic drugs in schedule III, IV, or V, or combinations of such drugs, are being dispensed or prescribed, or possessed, in violation of this Act.

''(iii) If, before the expiration of the period specified in clause (ii), the Secretary or the Attorney General publishes in the Federal Register a decision, made on the basis of determinations under such clause, that this paragraph should not remain in effect, this paragraph ceases to be in effect 60 days after the date on which the decision is so published. The Secretary shall, in making any such decision, consult with the Attorney General, and shall, in publishing the decision in the Federal Register, include any comments received from the Attorney General for inclusion in the publication. The Attorney General shall, in making any such decision, consult with the Secretary, and shall, in publishing the decision in the Federal Register, include any comments received from the Secretary for inclusion in the publication.

''(I) During the 3-year period beginning on the date of the enactment of the Methamphetamine Anti-Proliferation Act of 1999, a State may not preclude a practitioner from dispensing or prescribing narcotic drugs in schedule III, IV, or V, or combinations of such drugs, to patients for maintenance or detoxification treatment in accordance with this paragraph, or the other amendments made by section 22 of that Act, unless, before the expiration of that 3-year period, the State enacts a law prohibiting a practitioner from dispensing or prescribing such drugs or combination of drugs.''.

The State educational agency shall determine what actions constitute a violent criminal offense for purposes of this section.

''(d) CONSIDERATION OF ASSISTANCE.—Subject to subsection (h), assistance made available under this section that is used to pay the costs for a student to attend a private or religious school shall not be considered to be Federal aid to the school, and the Federal Government shall have no authority to influence or regulate the operations of a private or religious school as a result of assistance received under this section.

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

RECOGNITION OF DAVID POFFENBERGER, STUDENT AT PUYALLUP HIGH SCHOOL

● Mr. GORTON. Mr. President, during the past several weeks, a community in my state has come together to combat racism in their schools. One person, a student at Puyallup High School, has taken this problem head on and devised a way to bring his fellow students together in their fight against racism.

This student, David Poffenberger, an 18-year-old senior, designed a t-shirt that will be distributed to all of his 1,900 classmates in order to demonstrate Puyallup High School's united front against racism.

In one of his art classes, David created a design for the shirt—two silhouetted groups, one black and one white, united by a single handshake. David completed the shirt by adding the phrase, ''Bridge the Gap.'' With the encouragement from one of his art teachers, Candace Loring, David took a week off from swimming practice and visited with local community groups to turn his plan into reality.

The high school Booster Club, alumni association, the Puyallup Elks, and the Good Samaritan Hospital all contributed to his effort, raising over half of the $5,128 needed to print and distribute the shirts. The Booster Club has also agreed to cover the remaining amount in addition to their own $1,000 contribution.

David's principal, Wanda Berndston, credits him for single-handedly spearheading this effort to improve awareness throughout the school. In the midst of an unfortunate situation, it is often the individuals who are closest to the problem who can best offer solutions.

I commend David for his determination to make his school a better place for all students and am proud to present him with one of my ''Innovation in Education'' Awards.●

The Committee, or Chairman and Vice Chairman acting jointly on behalf of the Committee, may dismiss any matter which, after a preliminary inquiry, is determined to lack substantial merit. The Committee shall inform the complainant of the dismissal.

(2) The Committee may determine that there is such substantial credible evidence, but that the alleged violation is inadvertent, technical, or otherwise of a de minimis nature. In such case, the Committee may dispose of the matter by issuing a public or private letter of admonition, which shall not be considered discipline and which shall not be subject to appeal to the Senate. The issuance of a letter of admonition must be approved by the affirmative recorded vote of no fewer than four members of the Committee voting.

(3) The Committee may determine that there is such substantial credible evidence and that the matter cannot be appropriately disposed of under paragraph (2). In such case, the Committee shall promptly initiate an adjudicatory review in accordance with Rule 4. No adjudicatory review of conduct of a Member, officer, or employee of the Senate may be initiated except by the affirmative recorded vote of not less than four members of the Committee.

RULE 4: PROCEDURES FOR CONDUCTING AN ADJUDICATORY REVIEW

(a) Definition of Adjudicatory Review: An ''adjudicatory review'' is a proceeding undertaken by the Committee after a finding, on the basis of a preliminary inquiry, that there is substantial cause for the Committee to conclude that a violation within the jurisdiction of the Committee has occurred.

(b) Scope of Adjudicatory Review: When the Committee decides to conduct an adjudicatory review, it shall be of such duration and scope as is necessary for the Committee to determine whether a violation within its jurisdiction has occurred. An adjudicatory review shall be conducted by outside counsel as authorized by section 3(b)(1) of Senate Resolution 338 unless the Committee determines not to use outside counsel. In the course of the adjudicatory review, designated outside counsel, or if the Committee determines not to use outside counsel, the Committee or its staff, may conduct any inquiries or interviews, take sworn statements, use compulsory process as described in Rule 6, or take any other actions that the Committee deems appropriate to secure the evidence necessary to make a determination.

(c) Notice to Respondent: The Committee shall give written notice to any known respondent who is the subject of an adjudicatory review. The notice shall be sent to the respondent no later than five working days after the Committee has voted to conduct an adjudicatory review. The notice shall include a statement of the nature of the possible violation, and description of the evidence indicating that a possible violation occurred. The Committee may offer the respondent an opportunity to present a statement, orally or in writing, or to respond to questions from members of the Committee, the Committee staff, or outside counsel.

(d) Right to a Hearing: The Committee shall accord a respondent an opportunity for a hearing before it recommends disciplinary action against that respondent to the Senate or before it imposes an order of restitution or reprimand (not requiring discipline by the full Senate).

(e) Progress Reports to Committee: The Committee staff or outside counsel shall periodically report to the Committee concerning the progress of the adjudicatory review. Such reports shall be delivered to the Committee in the form and according to the schedule prescribed by the Committee, and shall be confidential.

(f) Final Report of Adjudicatory Review to Committee: Upon completion of an adjudicatory review, including any hearings held pursuant to Rule 5, the outside counsel or the staff shall submit a confidential written report to the Committee, which shall detail the factual findings of the adjudicatory review and which may recommend disciplinary action, if appropriate. Findings of fact of the adjudicatory review shall be detailed in this report whether or not disciplinary action is recommended.

(g) Committee Action:

(1) As soon as practicable following submission of the report of the staff or outside counsel on the adjudicatory review, the Committee shall prepare and submit a report to the Senate, including a recommendation or proposed resolution to the Senate concerning disciplinary action, if appropriate. A report shall be issued, stating in detail the Committee's findings of fact, whether or not disciplinary action is recommended. The report shall also explain fully the reasons underlying the Committee's recommendation concerning disciplinary action, if any. No adjudicatory review of conduct of a Member, officer or employee of the Senate may be conducted, or report or resolution or recommendation relating to such an adjudicatory review of conduct may be made, except by the affirmative recorded vote of not less than four members of the Committee.

(2) Pursuant to S. Res. 338, as amended, section 2(a), subsections (2), (3), and (4), after receipt of the report prescribed by paragraph (f) of this rule, the Committee may make any of the following recommendations for disciplinary action or issue an order for reprimand or restitution, as follows:

i. In the case of a Member, a recommendation to the Senate for expulsion, censure, payment of restitution, recommendation to a Member's party conference regarding the Member's seniority or positions of responsibility, or a combination of these;

ii. In the case of an officer or employee, a recommendation to the Senate of dismissal, suspension, payment of restitution, or a combination of these;

iii. In the case where the Committee determines, after according to the Member, officer, or employee due notice and opportunity for a hearing, that misconduct occurred warranting discipline less serious than discipline by the full Senate, and subject to the provisions of paragraph (h) of this rule relating to appeal, by a unanimous vote of six members order that a Member, officer or employee be reprimanded or pay restitution or both;

iv. In the case where the Committee determines that misconduct is inadvertent, technical, or otherwise of a de minimis nature, issue a public or private letter of admonition to a Member, officer or employee, which shall not be subject to appeal to the Senate.

(3) In the case where the Committee determines, upon consideration of all the evidence, that the facts do not warrant a finding that there is substantial credible evidence which provides substantial cause for the Committee to conclude that a violation within the jurisdiction of the Committee has occurred, the Committee may dismiss the matter.

(4) Promptly, after the conclusion of the adjudicatory review, the Committee's report and recommendation, if any, shall be forwarded to the Secretary of the Senate, and a copy shall be provided to the complainant and the respondent. The full report and recommendation, if any, shall be printed and made public, unless the Committee determines by the recorded vote of not less than four members of the Committee that it should remain confidential.

(h) Right of Appeal:

(1) Any individual who is the subject of a reprimand or order of restitution, or both, pursuant to subsection (g)(2)(iii), may, within 30 days of the Committee's report to the Senate of its action imposing a reprimand or order of restitution, or both, appeal to the Senate by providing written notice of the appeal to the Committee and the presiding officer of the Senate. The presiding officer shall cause the notice of the appeal to be printed in the Congressional Record and the Senate Journal.

(2) S. Res. 338 provides that a motion to proceed to consideration of an appeal pursuant to paragraph (1) shall be highly privileged and not debatable. If the motion to proceed to consideration of the appeal is agreed to, the appeal shall be decided on the basis of the Committee's report to the Senate. Debate on the appeal shall be limited to 10 hours, which shall be divided equally between, and controlled by, those favoring and those opposing the appeal.

RULE 5: PROCEDURES FOR HEARINGS

(a) Right to Hearing: The Committee may hold a public or executive hearing in any preliminary inquiry, adjudicatory review, or other proceeding. The Committee shall accord a respondent an opportunity for a hearing before it recommends disciplinary action against that respondent to the Senate or before it imposes on order of restitution or reprimand. (See Rule 4(d)).

(b) Non-Public Hearings: The Committee may at any time during a hearing determine in accordance with paragraph 5(b) of Rule XXVI of the Standing Rules of the Senate whether to receive the testimony of specific witnesses in executive session. If a witness desires to express a preference for testifying in public or in executive session, he or she shall so notify the Committee at least five days before he or she is scheduled to testify.

(c) Adjudicatory Hearings: The Committee may, by the recorded vote of not less than four members of the Committee, designate any public or executive hearing as an adjudicatory hearing; and any hearing which is concerned with possible disciplinary action against a respondent or respondents designated by the Committee shall be an adjudicatory hearing. In any adjudicatory hearing, the procedures described in paragraph (j) shall apply.

(d) Subpoena Power: The Committee may require, by subpoena or otherwise, the attendance and testimony of such witnesses and the production of such correspondence, books, papers, documents or other articles as it deems advisable. (See Rule 6.)

(e) Notice of Hearings: The Committee shall make public an announcement of the date, place, and subject matter of any hearing to be conducted by it, in accordance with Rule 1(f).

(f) Presiding Officer: The Chairman shall preside over the hearings, or in his absence the Vice Chairman. If the Vice Chairman is also absent, a Committee member designated by the Chairman shall preside. If an oath or affirmation is required, it shall be administered to a witness by the Presiding Officer, or in his absence, by any Committee member.

(g) Witnesses:

(1) A subpoena or other request to testify shall be served on a witness sufficiently in advance of his or her scheduled appearance to allow the witness a reasonable period of time, as determined by the Committee, to prepare for the hearing and to employ counsel if desired.

(2) The Committee may, by recorded vote of not less than four members of the Committee, rule that no member of the Committee or staff or outside counsel shall make public the name of any witness subpoenaed by the Committee before the date of that witness's scheduled appearance, except as specifically authorized by the Chairman and Vice Chairman, acting jointly.

(3) Any witness desiring to read a prepared or written statement in executive or public hearings shall file a copy of such statement with the Committee at least two working days in advance of the hearing at which the statement is to be presented. The Chairman and Vice Chairman shall determine whether such statements may be read or placed in the record of the hearing.

(4) Insofar as practicable, each witness shall be permitted to present a brief oral opening statement, if he or she desires to do so.

Right To Testify: Any person whose name is mentioned or who is specifically identified or otherwise referred to in testimony or in statements made by a Committee member, staff number or outside counsel, or any witness, and who reasonably believes that the statement tends to adversely affect his or her reputation may—

(1) Request to appear personally before the Committee to testify in his or her own behalf; or

(2) File a sworn statement of facts relevant to the testimony or other evidence or statement of which he or she complained. Such request and such statement shall be submitted to the Committee for its consideration and action.

(i) Conduct of Witnesses and Other Attendees: The Presiding Officer may punish any breaches of order and decorum by censure and exclusion from the hearings. The Committee, by majority vote, may recommend to the Senate that the offender be cited for contempt of Congress.

(j) Adjudicatory Hearing Procedures:

(1) Notice of hearings: A copy of the public announcement of an adjudicatory hearing, required by paragraph (e), shall be furnished together with a copy of these Rules to all witnesses at the time that they are subpoenaed or otherwise summoned to testify.

(2) Preparation for adjudicatory hearings:

(A) At least five working days prior to the commencement of an adjudicatory hearing, the Committee shall provide the following information and documents to the respondent, if any:

(i) a list of proposed witnesses to be called at the hearing;

(ii) copies of all documents expected to be introduced as exhibits at the hearing; and

(iii) a brief statement as to the nature of the testimony expected to be given by each witness to be called at the hearing.

(B) At least two working days prior to the commencement of an adjudicatory hearing, the respondent, if any, shall provide the information and documents described in divisions, (i), (ii) and (iii) of subparagraph (A) to the Committee.

(C) At the discretion of the Committee, the information and documents to be exchange under this paragraph shall be subject to an appropriate agreement limiting access and disclosure.

(D) If a respondent refuses to provide the information and documents to the Committee (see (A) and (B) of this subparagraph), or if a respondent or other individual violates an agreement limiting access and disclosure, the Committee, by majority vote, may recommend to the Senate that the offender be cited for contempt of Congress.

(3) Swearing of witnesses: All witnesses who testify at adjudicatory hearings shall be sworn unless the Presiding Officer, for good cause, decides that a witness does not have to be sworn.

(4) Right to counsel: Any witness at an adjudicatory hearing may be accompanied by counsel of his or her own choosing, who shall be permitted to advise the witness of his or her legal rights during the testimony.

(5) Right to cross-examine and call witnesses:

(A) In adjudicatory hearings, any respondent and any other person who obtains the permission of the Committee, may personally or through counsel cross-examine witnesses called by the Committee and may call witnesses in his or her own behalf.

(B) A respondent may apply to the Committee for the issuance of subpoenas for the appearance of witnesses or the production of documents on his or her behalf. An application shall be approved upon a concise showing by the respondent that the proposed testimony or evidence is relevant and appropriate, as determined by the Chairman and Vice Chairman.

(C) With respect to witnesses called by a respondent, or other individual given permission by the Committee, each such witness shall first be examined by the party who called the witness or by that party's counsel.

(D) At least one working day before a witness's scheduled appearance, a witness or a witness's counsel may submit to the Committee written questions proposed to be asked of that witness. If the Committee determines that it is necessary, such questions may be asked by any member of the Committee, or by any Committee staff member if directed by a Committee member. The witness or witness's counsel may also submit additional sworn testimony for the record within twenty-four hours after the last day that the witness has testified. The insertion of such testimony in that day's record is subject to the approval of the Chairman and Vice Chairman acting jointly within five days after the testimony is received.

(6) Admissibility of evidence:

(A) The object of the hearing shall be to ascertain the truth. Any evidence that may be relevant and probative shall be admissible, unless privileged under the Federal Rules of Evidence. Rules of evidence shall not be applied strictly but the Presiding Officer shall exclude irrelevant or unduly repetitious testimony. Objections going only to the weight that should be given evidence will not justify its exclusion.

(B) The Presiding Officer shall rule upon any question of the admissibility of testimony or other evidence presented to the Committee. Such rulings shall be final unless reversed or modified by a recorded vote of not less than four members of the Committee before the recess of that day's hearings.

(C) Notwithstanding paragraphs (A) and (B), in any matter before the Committee involving allegations of sexual discrimination, including sexual harassment, or sexual misconduct, by a Member, officer, or employee, within the jurisdiction of the Committee, the Committee shall be guided by the standards and procedures of Rule 412 of the Federal Rules of Evidence, except that the Committee may admit evidence subject to the provisions of this paragraph only upon a determination of not less than four members of the full Committee that the interests of justice require that such evidence be admitted.

(7) Supplementary hearing procedures: The Committee may adopt any additional special hearing procedures that it deems necessary or appropriate to a particular adjudicatory hearing. Copies of such supplementary procedures shall be furnished to witnesses and respondents, and shall be made available upon request to any member of the public.

(k) Transcripts:

(1) An accurate stenographic or recorded transcript shall be made of all public and executive hearings. Any member of the Committee, Committee staff member, outside counsel retained by the Committee, or witness may examine a copy of the transcript retained by the Committee of his or her own remarks and may suggest to the official reporter any typographical or transcription errors. If the reporter declines to make the requested corrections, the member, staff member, outside counsel or witness may request a ruling by the Chairman and Vice Chairman acting jointly. Any member or witness shall return the transcript with suggested corrections to the Committee offices within five working days after receipt of the transcript, or as soon thereafter as is practicable. If the testimony as given in executive session, the member or witness may only inspect the transcript at a location determined by the Chairman and Vice Chairman, acting jointly. Any questions arising with respect to the processing and correction of transcripts shall be decided by the Chairman and Vice Chairman, acting jointly.

(2) Except for the record of a hearing which is closed to the public, each transcript shall be printed as soon as is practicable after receipt of the corrected version. The Chairman and Vice Chairman, acting jointly, may order the transcript of a hearing to be printed without the corrections of a member or witness if they determine that such member of witness has been afforded a reasonable time to correct such transcript and such transcript has not been returned within such time.

(3) The committee shall furnish each witness, at no cost, one transcript copy of that witness's testimony given at a public hearing. If the testimony was given in executive session, then a transcript copy shall be provided upon request, subject to appropriate conditions and restrictions prescribed by the Chairman and Vice Chairman. If any individual violates such conditions and restrictions, the Committee may recommend by majority vote that he or she be cited for contempt of Congress.

RULE 6: SUBPOENAS AND DEPOSITIONS

(a) Subpoenas:

(1) Authorization for issuance: Subpoenas for the attendance and testimony of witnesses at depositions or hearings, and subpoenas for the production of documents and tangible things at depositions, hearings, or other times and places designated therein, may be authorized for issuance by either (A) a majority vote of the Committee, or (B) the Chairman and Vice Chairman, acting jointly, at any time during a preliminary inquiry, adjudicatory review, or other proceeding.

(2) Signature and service: All subpoenas shall be signed by the Chairman or the Vice Chairman and may be served by any person eighteen years of age or older, who is designated by the Chairman or Vice Chairman. Each subpoena shall be served with a copy of the Rules of the committee and a brief statement of the purpose of the Committee's proceeding.

(3) Withdrawal of subpoena: The Committee, by recorded vote of not less than four members of the Committee, may withdraw any subpoena authorized for issuance by it or authorized for issuance by the Chairman and Vice Chairman, acting jointly. The Chairman and Vice Chairman, acting jointly, may withdraw any subpoena authorized for issuance by them.

(b) Depositions:

(1) Persons authorized to take depositions: Depositions may be taken by any member of the Committee designated by the Chairman and Vice Chairman, acting jointly, or by any other person designated by the Chairman and Vice Chairman, acting jointly, including outside counsel, Committee staff, other employees of the Senate, or government employees detailed to the Committee.

(2) Deposition notices: Notices for the taking of depositions shall be authorized by the Committee, or the Chairman and Vice Chairman, acting jointly, and issued by the Chairman and Vice Chairman, or a Committee staff member or outside counsel designated by the Chairman and Vice Chairman, acting jointly. Depositions may be taken at any time during a preliminary inquiry, adjudicatory review or other proceeding. Deposition notices shall specify a time and place for examination. Unless otherwise specified, the deposition shall be in private, and the testimony taken and documents produced shall be deemed for the purpose of these rules to have been received in a closed or executive session of the Committee. The Committee shall not initiate procedures leading to criminal or civil enforcement proceedings for a witness's failure to appear, or to testify, or to produce documents, unless the deposition notice was accompanied by a subpoena authorized for issuance by the Committee, or the Chairman and Vice Chairman, acting jointly.

(3) Counsel at depositions: Witnesses may be accompanied at a deposition by counsel to advise them of their rights.

(4) Deposition procedure: Witnesses at depositions shall be examined upon oath administered by an individual authorized by law to administer oaths, or administered by any member of the Committee if one is present. Questions may be propounded by any person or persons who are authorized to take depositions for the Committee. If a witness objects to a question and refuses to testify, or refuses to produce a document, any member of the Committee who is present may rule on the objection and, if the objection is overruled, direct the witness to answer the question or produce the document. If no member of the Committee is present, the individual who has been designated by the Chairman and Vice Chairman, acting jointly, to take the deposition may proceed with the deposition, or may, at that time or at a subsequent time, seek a ruling by telephone or otherwise on the objection from the Chairman or Vice Chairman of the Committee, who may refer the matter to the Committee or rule on the objection. If the Chairman or Vice Chairman, or the Committee upon referral, overrules the objection, the Chairman, Vice Chairman, or the Committee as the case may be, may direct the witness to answer the question or produce the document. The Committee shall not initiate procedures leading to civil or criminal enforcement unless the witness refuses to testify or produce documents after having been directed to do so.

(5) Filing of depositions: Deposition testimony shall be transcribed or electronically recorded. If the deposition is transcribed, the individual administering the oath shall certify on the transcript that the witness was fully sworn in his or her presence and the transcriber shall certify that the transcript is a true record of the testimony. The transcript with these certifications shall be filed with the chief clerk of the Committee, and the witness shall be furnished with access to a copy at the Committee's offices for review. Upon inspecting the transcript, within a time limit set by the Chairman and Vice Chairman, acting jointly, a witness may request in writing changes in the transcript to correct errors in transcription. The witness may also bring to the attention of the Committee errors of fact in the witness's testimony by submitting a sworn statement about those facts with a request that it be attached to the transcript. The Chairman and Vice Chairman, acting jointly, may rule on the witness's request, and the changes or attachments allowed shall be certified by the Committee's chief clerk. If the witness fails to make any request under this paragraph within the time limit set, this fact shall be noted by the Committee's chief clerk. Any person authorized by the Committee may stipulate with the witness to changes in this procedure.

Mr. SMITH of New Hampshire. Mr. President, on behalf of Vice Chairman REID and other Members of the Ethics Committee, I am pleased to submit the ''Senate Ethics Procedure Reform Resolution of 1999'' for Senate consideration. This Resolution will implement key recommendations of the Senate Ethics Study Commission of 1993, a body which included among its members both the current distinguished Majority Leader and the distinguished Minority Leader.

Mr. REID. Mr. President, I am proud to join with Chairman SMITH and other Members of the Ethics Committee to bring this Reform Resolution to the floor for consideration. And I would like to take this opportunity to thank the Chairman for his leadership in working to implement these much needed changes in the Ethics Committee process.

Mr. SMITH of New Hampshire. I appreciate the Vice Chairman's comments and, more importantly, acknowledge his assistance and support in bringing these Reform measures before the Senate. This Resolution is the product of a mutual and supportive effort on both sides of the aisle to improve the Ethics Committee's procedures.

Let us briefly describe the changes included in this Reform. First, as Members may recall, the 1993 Study Commission was charged with studying the Ethics Committee's procedures and recommending needed changes. Such a Commission arose, a large part, out of the universal observation by those who had participated in Ethics Committee proceedings that: (1) the procedures were unnecessarily confusing and complex; and (2) that this created the potential for unfairness to those affected and contributed to a lack of confidence by those observing the process. In its hearings, the 1993 Study Commission heard from three distinguished former chairs of the Ethics Committee, attorneys who have practiced before and with the Ethics Committee, and experts on ethics issues and procedures from academia and public organizations with interests in legislative ethics. The resulting Commission Report, issued in 1994, recommended several changes designed to enhance public confidence in the Senate's ability to fulfill its constitutional duty of self-discipline.

The Reform Resolution now before the Senate includes those Commission recommendations specifically designed to simplify and streamline the Senate Ethics process. These reforms are intended to expedite the handling of ethics complaints in a way which should make the process fairer and more understandable. By eliminating the current unnecessary, multi-stage process for fact gathering, and using a single phase ''preliminary inquiry'' for that purpose, the process will make a lot more sense, and should save some time. If, after the facts are in, there is substantial evidence with causes the Ethics Committee to conclude that a violation may have occurred, then changes would be issued, and an ''adjudicative review'' of the evidence would ensue. This simplified process will be the same, whether the complaint is sworn or unsworn, and there will continue to be no procedural formalities surrounding the filing of a complaint with the Committee.

Mr. REID. The Reform Resolution also proposes a uniform set of possible sanctions for violations. The reforms would continue the Ethics Committee's current authority to dismiss a complaint because there is no violation, or find that any violation is inadvertent or otherwise de minimis and resolve it informally, after the Committee has gathered the facts. Both the current and the reformed process contemplate a letter of disapproval to resolve situations where a violation is de minimis and does not deserve formal discipline. Although the use of such letters is not explicit under current rules, such letters have historically been used by the Committee to resolve complaints, and the reformed process would expressly provide for public or private ''Letters of Admonition'' for this purpose. Such letters have not been and would not be considered discipline.

As to discipline by the Committee, the current process permits the Committee to resolve a case, with the Committee does not believe deserves sanction by the full Senate, by suggesting a remedy such as a reprimand, but only with consent of the respondent. The usefulness of this method of resolution is limited by the requirement of consent. The reformed process would authorize the Committee to resolve an appropriate case with a reprimand without consent, and/or financial restitution, but only after an opportunity for hearing and only with a right of appeal of the full Senate. In this fashion, cases which the Committee does not believe deserve discipline by the full Senate could be resolved, and the individual's right to defend his or her conduct before the full Senate would be preserved.

Mr. SMITH of New Hampshire. Beyond reprimand, and reserved for only the most serious cases, both the current and the reformed process contemplate that the Committee may make recommendations to the full Senate for Senate discipline. Under the current process, with respect to Members, the Committee has recommended or the full Senate has considered, either alone or in combination: financial restitution, disgorgement of funds, referral to a party conference for attention (regarding seniority or positions of responsibility), denouncement, censure, condemnation, and expulsion. The current system's use of a variety of terms, each of which has been considered by Senate historians to be censure, has resulted in some confusion about the Senate's intent in disciplining its Members. The proposed process would provide the Committee with a uniform set of recommendations for use either alone or in combination: financial restitution, referral to a party conference for attention (regarding seniority or positions of responsibility), censure, and expulsion. Absent extraordinary circumstances, the intent would be to use uniform terminology in recommending discipline to the Senate, although the Committee would retain needed flexibility in this regard. The proposal would also add financial restitution to the possible recommendations respecting a Senate officer or employee; suspension and dismissal are currently included.

Finally, Mr. President the Reform Resolution would amend the Ethics Committee's enabling resolution to expressly provide for the Committee's educational function.

Mr. DOMENICI. I ask unanimous consent the resolution be agreed to, the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table, and any statements be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The resolution (S. Res. 222) was agreed to, as follows:

S. RES. 222

SEC. 3. DUTIES OF THE SELECT COMMITTEE.

Section 2 of the resolution is amended—

(1) in subsection (a), by striking paragraphs (2), (3), and (4) and inserting the following:

''(2)(A) recommend to the Senate by report or resolution by a majority vote of the full committee disciplinary action to be taken with respect to such violations which the Select Committee shall determine, after according to the individual concerned due notice and opportunity for a hearing, to have occurred;

''(B) pursuant to subparagraph (A) recommend discipline, including—

''(i) in the case of a Member, a recommendation to the Senate for expulsion, censure, payment of restitution, recommendation to a Member's party conference regarding the Member's seniority or positions of responsibility, or a combination of these; and

''(ii) in the case of an officer or employee, dismissal, suspension, payment of restitution, or a combination of these;

''(3) subject to the provisions of subsection (e), by a unanimous vote of 6 members, order that a Member, officer, or employee be reprimanded or pay restitution, or both, if the Select Committee determines, after according to the Member, officer, or employee due notice and opportunity for a hearing, that misconduct occurred warranting discipline less serious than discipline by the full Senate;

''(4) in the circumstances described in subsection (d)(3), issue a public or private letter of admonition to a Member, officer, or employee, which shall not be subject to appeal to the Senate;

''(5) recommend to the Senate, by report or resolution, such additional rules or regulations as the Select Committee shall determine to be necessary or desirable to insure proper standards of conduct by Members of the Senate, and by officers or employees of the Senate, in the performance of their duties and the discharge of their responsibilities;

(2) by amending subsection (b) to read as follows:

''(b) For the purposes of this resolution—

''(1) the term 'sworn complaint' means a written statement of facts, submitted under penalty of perjury, within the personal knowledge of the complainant alleging a violation of law, the Senate Code of Official Conduct, or any other rule or regulation of the Senate relating to the conduct of individuals in the performance of their duties as Members, officers, or employees of the Senate;

''(2) the term 'preliminary inquiry' means a proceeding undertaken by the Select Committee following the receipt of a complaint or allegation of, or information about, misconduct by a Member, officer, or employee of the Senate to determine whether there is substantial credible evidence which provides substantial cause for the Select Committee to conclude that a violation within the jurisdiction of the Select Committee has occurred; and

''(3) the term 'adjudicatory review' means a proceeding undertaken by the Select Committee after a finding, on the basis of a preliminary inquiry, that there is substantial credible evidence which provides substantial cause for the Select Committee to conclude that a violation within the jurisdiction of the Select Committee has occurred.'';

(3) in subsection (c), by amending paragraph (1) to read as follows:

''(1) No—

''(A) adjudicatory review of conduct of a Member or officer of the Senate may be conducted;

''(B) report, resolution, or recommendation relating to such an adjudicatory review of conduct may be made; and

''(C) letter of admonition pursuant to subsection (d)(3) may be issued, unless approved by the affirmative recorded vote of no fewer than 4 members of the Select Committee.'';

(4) by amending subsection (d) to read as follows:

''(d)(1) When the Select Committee receives a sworn complaint or other allegation or information about a Member, officer, or employee of the Senate, it shall promptly conduct a preliminary inquiry into matters raised by that complaint, allegation, or information. The preliminary inquiry shall be of duration and scope necessary to determine whether there is substantial credible evidence which provides substantial cause for the Select Committee to conclude that a violation within the jurisdiction of the Select Committee has occurred. The Select Committee may delegate to the chairman and vice chairman the discretion to determine the appropriate duration, scope, and conduct of a preliminary inquiry.

''(2) If, as a result of a preliminary inquiry under paragraph (1), the Select Committee determines by a recorded vote that there is not such substantial credible evidence, the Select Committee shall dismiss the matter. The Select Committee may delegate to the chairman and vice chairman the authority, on behalf of the Select Committee, to dismiss any matter that they determine, after a preliminary inquiry, lacks substantial merit. The Select Committee shall inform the individual who provided to the Select Committee the complaint, allegation, or information, and the individual who is the subject of the complaint, allegation, or information, of the dismissal, together with an explanation of the basis for the dismissal.

''(3) If, as a result of a preliminary inquiry under paragraph (1), the Select Committee determines that a violation is inadvertent, technical, or otherwise of a de minimis nature, the Select Committee may dispose of the matter by issuing a public or private letter of admonition, which shall not be considered discipline. The Select Committee may issue a public letter of admonition upon a similar determination at the conclusion of an adjudicatory review.

''(4) If, as the result of a preliminary inquiry under paragraph (1), the Select Committee determines that there is such substantial credible evidence and the matter cannot be appropriately disposed of under paragraph (3), the Select Committee shall promptly initiate an adjudicatory review. Upon the conclusion of such adjudicatory review, the Select Committee shall report to the Senate, as soon as practicable, the results of such adjudicatory review, together with its recommendations (if any) pursuant to subsection (a)(2).'';

(5) by amending subsection (e) to read as follows:

''(e)(1) Any individual who is the subject of a reprimand or order of restitution, or both, pursuant to subsection (a)(3) may, within 30 days of the Select Committee's report to the Senate of its action imposing a reprimand or order of restitution, or both, appeal to the Senate by providing written notice of the basis for the appeal to the Select Committee and the presiding officer of the Senate. The presiding officer of the Senate shall cause the notice of the appeal to be printed in the Congressional Record and the Senate Journal.

''(2) A motion to proceed to consideration of an appeal pursuant to paragraph (1) shall be highly privileged and not debatable. If the motion to proceed to consideration of the appeal is agreed to, the appeal shall be decided on the basis of the Select Committee's report to the Senate. Debate on the appeal shall be limited to 10 hours, which shall be divided equally between, and controlled by, those favoring and those opposing the appeal.'';

(6) by amending subsection (g) to read as follows:

''(g) Notwithstanding any other provision of this section, no adjudicatory review shall be initiated of any alleged violation of any law, the Senate Code of Official Conduct, rule, or regulation which was not in effect at the time the alleged violation occurred. No provisions of the Senate Code of Official Conduct shall apply to or require disclosure of any act, relationship, or transaction which occurred prior to the effective date of the applicable provision of the Code. The Select Committee may initiate an adjudicatory review of any alleged violation of a rule or law which was in effect prior to the enactment of the Senate Code of Official Conduct if the alleged violation occurred while such rule or law was in effect and the violation was not a matter resolved on the merits by the predecessor Select Committee.''; and

(7) by amending subsection (h) to read as follows:

''(h) The Select Committee shall adopt written rules setting forth procedures to be used in conducting preliminary inquiries and adjudicatory reviews.''.

SEC. 4. AUTHORITY OF THE SELECT COMMITTEE.

Section 3 of the resolution is amended—

(1) in subsection (b), by amending paragraph (2) to read as follows:

(c) GUIDELINES.—Not later than 30 days after the date of enactment of this Act, the Administrator of the Small Business Administration shall issue guidelines to implement the amendments made by this section.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be agreed to and the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BOND. Mr. President, I rise today in support of the Women's Business Centers Sustainability Act of 1999 (S. 791). This bill is the latest step by the Committee on Small Business to strengthen the Women's Business Center program at the Small Business Administration (SBA). Since this program first opened its doors in 1989, it has grown from an initial 12 centers to 81 centers operating in 47 states, the District of Columbia, Puerto Rico, and the Virgin Islands. The bill I am bringing before the Senate today will increase the authorization level for the Women's business Centers program. Further, this bill establishes a four year pilot program that will, for the first time, allow centers that have completed a grant or that are in their last year of a grant under this program to apply for a second, five year grant.

S. 791 was approved by the Committee on Small Business by a 17–1 vote, and I am urging my colleagues to support this bill with an amendment that Senator KERRY and I are offering on the floor today. The amendment includes changes to the bill that have been agreed to by the House Committee on Small business. Once Senate action on this bill is complete, it is our hope the House of Representatives will be able to pass the bill before Congress adjourns, clearing the measure for the President's approval. The amendment adopts the authorization levels included in the House-passed version of this bill, and it places all centers on an equal footing when competing for sustainability grants.

During the past decade, the number of women-owned small businesses has exploded. Women-owned small businesses are the fastest growing segment of our nation's business community. Years ago, there was an advertising campaign slogan proclaiming that women ''had come a long way.'' I find that slogan very applicable to the plateau now reached by women entrepreneurs. Women business owners have established themselves as a key component of our small business community, which has been the engine driving our economy during the 1990's.

The research foundation arm of the National Association of Women business Owners (NAWBR) has conducted studies which show that women no longer are having more trouble than men obtaining bank loans. However, obtaining a loan does not guarantee a business' success. In fact, many small businesses that start out well capitalized end up failing. Success of a small business is usually dependent on the owners' management capabilities. Women's Business Centers offer help to women entrepreneurs who are looking to start a business or who already have a business by providing them with business and education training, including marketing, finance, and management assistance.

For the past three years, I have worked with Senator DOMENICI, Senator KERRY, and Members of the Committee on Small Business first to save and later to expand the Women's Business Center Program. In 1996, when the Administration sought to zero-out the budget of the program, I helped lead the effort to earmark funds for the program within SBA's Fiscal Year 1997 budget. In 1997, Senator DOMENICI, Senator KERRY and I sponsored the ''Women's Business Centers Act of 1997,'' which expanded the program from $4 million to $8 million per year. This bill was incorporated into the ''Small Business Reauthorization Act of 1997'' (Public Law 105–135).

Earlier this year, the Congress passed the ''Women's Business Center Amendments Act of 1999'' (Public Law 106–17), which helped bring us closer to achieving our goal of having at least one Women's Business Center up and running in each of the 50 states. This law authorized $11 million for Fiscal Year 2000 for the Women's Business Center Program, which allows SBA to continue to fund the existing 35 eligible Centers and provide seed funding to new eligible applicant Centers in states not yet served by the program.

Under this latest step to strengthen the SBA's program for women-owned businesses, the ''Women's Business Centers Sustainability Act of 1999'' addresses the ongoing funding constraints that are making it increasingly difficult for Women's Business Centers to sustain the level of services they provide after they graduate from the Women's Business Centers program.

To help these centers, S. 791 would establish a four-year competitive grant pilot program that allows graduating and graduated centers that offer ongoing programs and services to women entrepreneurs to compete for another five years of matching grants known as a ''sustainability grant.'' ''Graduating centers'' are centers that are in the final year of their initial five-year funding cycle. A ''graduated center'' is a center that participated in the Women's Business Center program and no longer receives program funds but is still actively providing business programs and services to its local market.

The ''Women's Business Center Sustainability Act of 1999'' also increases oversight and review of the Women's Business Centers. Earlier this year, the General Accounting Office (GAO) undertook an examination of the Women's Business Center Program at the request of the Senate and House Committees on Small Business. The GAO found that more than two-thirds of the centers that currently receive grant funds or that received funds in the past continue to operate as Women's Business Centers. Most that are continuing to operate after Federal support ceased have continued to offer similar services to women business owners.

While conducting its examination, GAO investigators experienced difficulty obtaining complete data about the program from the SBA because of limitations of SBA's records and databases for program years 1989 through 1998. I am concerned about the report from the GAO highlighting the failure of SBA to keep complete program and financial records on Centers that are receiving SBA grants funds; therefore, the bill includes a provision requiring the SBA to send the Senate and House Committees on Small Business a yearly Management Report on the status of the program. This report will include an annual programmatic and financial examination of each Women's Business Center. Further, SBA is directed to make a determination annually of the programmatic and financial viability of each Women's Business Center. It is my belief that this new statutory requirement will lead to better SBA oversight and a stronger Women's Business Center Program.

During the Committee's consideration of S. 791, it approved unanimously an amendment sponsored by Senator ABRAHAM addressing Federal procurement opportunities for women-owned small businesses. The amendment directs the GAO to conduct an audit on the federal procurement system for the preceding three years and report on all identifiable trends in Federal contracting that are related to women-owned small businesses.

It is difficult to understand how the women-owned small businesses segment of our economy can make up 38 percent of all small businesses and receive only 2.2 percent of the $181 billion in Federal prime contracts. In 1994, Congress passed into law a goal for women-owned small businesses to receive at least 5 percent of the total amount of Federal prime contract dollars. I am distributed by the failure of the Federal agencies to meet this goal, and it is our intention for the GAO study to shed some light on this problem.

Mr. President, passage of the ''Women's Business Centers Sustainability Act of 1999'' will build on the progress and successes we have accomplished to assist women entrepreneurs succeed as small business owners. I urge each of my colleagues to vote in favor of this important legislation.

Mr. KERRY. Mr. President, seven months ago I introduced the Women's Business Centers Sustainability Act of 1999, a bill to help our Women's Business Centers weather the increasingly harsh climate of fundraising. These centers play an important role in our economy and in promoting economic independence for women. They help women take an honest look at their strengths and interests to find out whether they should strike out on their own. They teach women how to turn their talents into a business. And they train women in the fundamentals of starting and running a successful business. The centers are located in rural, urban and suburban areas, and direct much of their training and counseling assistance toward socially and economically disadvantaged women.

Through the Women's Business Centers Program, business development resources and assistance available to women have steadily improved. The program opened its first 12 centers in 1989. Ten years later, women receive assistance at 81 centers in 47 states, the District of Columbia, Puerto Rico, and the Virgin Islands. In addition to increasing self-sufficiency among women, Women's Business Centers strengthen women's business ownership overall and encourage local job creation. Over the past decade, the number of women-owned businesses operating in this country has grown by 103 percent to an estimated 9.1 million firms, generating $3.6 trillion in sales annually, while employing more than 27.5 million workers. In 1998, women-owned businesses made up more than one-third of the 23 million small businesses in the United States.

In spite of the important contributions the Women's Business Centers make to the national economy, we are in danger of losing many effective centers if we don't change the funding structure before their five-year funding runs out. Currently, the Small Business Administration's Women's Business Centers program provides five-year grants of up to $150,000, matched by non-Federal dollars, to private-sector organizations so that they can establish business-training centers for women. From Senate and House hearings at the beginning of the year, we know that without the Federal matching grant, most centers cannot afford to continue providing the same quality of services or to keep their doors open. That money is their bread and butter, as well as indispensable for leveraging fundraising dollars. I believe the Women's Business Centers Sustainability Act of 1999 is a fair way to let WBCs recompete for the base funding.

The Women's Business Centers Act creates a four-year pilot that allows graduating and graduated centers to recompete for five-year matching grants of up to $125,000. It requires the SBA to do site visits as part of the final selection process so that we can better judge which centers merit a sustainability grant after five years in the program. It includes a provision from Senator BOND to increase management oversight and review of Centers to better evaluate the viability of centers and improve SBA's management of the program. And it incrementally raises over four years the annual authorization levels from $12 million in fiscal year 2000 to $14.5 million in fiscal year 2003. The increased authorization levels ensure that there are adequate monies to fund 45 existing centers, an average of eight recompeting centers annually, and an average of 10 new centers per year.

The Women's Business Centers Sustainability Act of 1999 has tremendous support. It is also the product of old-fashioned cooperation between Democrats and Republicans, and the House and Senate. I want to thank not only the 30 Senators—20 Democrats and 10 Republicans—who are cosponsors of this bill, but also the staff members on the House Small Business Committee who work for Chairman TALENT, Ranking Member NYDIA VELÁZQUEZ, and Congresswoman KELLY.

For the record, I would like to recognize the 30 cosponsors of my bill—BOND, HARKIN, BINGAMAN, DOMENICI, LEVIN, ENZI, KENNEDY, ABRAHAM, SARBANES, AKAKA, EDWARDS, FEINSTEIN, LANDRIEU, BOXER, CLELAND, KOHL, WELLSTONE, BURNS, LEAHY, SNOWE, HUTCHISON, DURBIN, SANTORUM, MURRAY, MIKULSKI, INOUYE, JEFFORDS, LIEBERMAN, BENNETT and ROBB.

Mr. President, I know how important this bill is to members on both sides of the aisle. I thank my colleagues for their support.

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, I am pleased the Senate is prepared to pass the Women's Business Centers Sustainability Act of 1999. I am an original cosponsor of this legislation to strengthen SBA's Women's Business Centers in Michigan and across the nation which help entrepreneurs start and maintain successful businesses by providing such things as start-up help and financial expertise to women-owned businesses. This legislation will allow those Women's Business Centers that are already successfully participating in the program to recompete for Federal funding after their initial funding term expires. These Centers would have previously been ineligible for renewed funding.

Women-owned businesses are the fastest growing sector of small businesses in America and provide innumerable jobs and resources to the state of Michigan and around the country. Last year, women-owned businesses made up more than one-third of the 23 million small businesses in the United States. The Women's Business Center program offers important tools to women who want to start or expand small businesses. However, the program is in danger of losing many effective Centers because the Centers are finding it increasingly difficult to raise the required non-Federal matching funds necessary to keep the programs running.

This legislation allows existing Centers to recompete for Federal funds, but sets the recompetition standards higher than those used for centers applying for their initial five-year funding term. This is to take into account established Centers' higher levels of experience and ensures that Centers meeting the highest standards can continue to get funded. The ability of established and successful Women's Business Development Centers to continue to compete for Federal funding means that critical resources will continue to be made available for women-owned businesses for such purposes as training and obtaining business financing.

Michigan has three Women's Business Centers, the Center for Empowerment and Economic Development, CEED, which houses the Women's Initiative for Self-Employment, WISE, in Ann Arbor, the Grand Rapids Opportunities for Women, GROW, in Grand Rapids, and The Detroit Entrepreneurship Institute, Inc, DEI.

These Michigan programs offer women who want to open a small business a comprehensive package of business education and training, start-up financing, technical assistance, peer group support and access to community and government supportive resources such as child care. Michigan's Women's Business Centers strongly support this legislation and believe they need to be able to recompete for Federal resources in order to continue to be able to offer the current levels of services and support to Michigan's women-owned businesses. This bill would allow them to do that.

I am pleased that Congress has continued to recognize the importance of funding the Women's Business Center program. In 1997, Congress enacted legislation to make a 1989–1991 pilot project a permanent part of the Small Business Administration programs available to help entrepreneurs start and maintain successful business. It also doubled the annual funding of the Women's Business Centers and extend the funding period from 3 to 5 years. And just this year, Congress enacted legislation to change the non-Federal and Federal funding ratio requirements and it again increased the annual authorization level from $8 million to $11 million.

The legislation that will be passed by the Senate today under a unanimous consent agreement will allow existing Women's Business Centers to compete for additional Federal funding. It also authorizes increased appropriations for the program for 4 years. It increases the FY 2000 and FY 2001 authorization from $11 million to $12 million. It also authorizes appropriations of $12.8 million in FY 2001; $13.7 million in FY 2002; and $14.5 million in FY 2003 for this program.

This is an important piece of legislation and I am pleased my Senate colleagues are supporting it.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the substitute amendment, as amended, be agreed to, the bill, as amended, be read three times, passed, and the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table, and that any statements be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The committee amendment in the nature of a substitute, as amended, was agreed to.

The bill (S. 791), as amended, was read the third time and passed, as follows:

Mr. BOND. Mr. President, I rise in support of the ''Independent Office of Advocacy Act'' (S. 1346). This bill is designed to build on the success achieved by the Office of Advocacy over the past 23 years. It is intended to strengthen that foundation to make the Office of Advocacy a stronger, more effective advocate for all small businesses throughout the United States. I introduced the ''Independent Office of Advocacy Act'' on July 1, 1999. Two weeks later, on July 15th, the Committee on Small Business voted unanimously, 17–0, in favor of this important legislation.

The Office of Advocacy is a unique office within the Federal government. It is part of the Small Business Administration (SBA/Agency), and its director, the Chief Counsel for Advocacy, is nominated by the President and confirmed by the Senate. At the same time, the Office is also intended to be the independent voice for small business within the Federal government. It is supposed to develop proposals for changing government policies to help small businesses, and it is supposed to represent the views and interests of small businesses before other Federal agencies.

As the director of the Office of Advocacy, the Chief Counsel for Advocacy has a dual responsibility. On the one hand, he is the independent watchdog for small business. On the other hand, he is also a part of the President's Administration. As you can imagine, those are sometimes difficult roles to play simultaneously.

The ''Independent Office of Advocacy Act'' would make the Office of Advocacy and the Chief Counsel for Advocacy a fully independent advocate within the Executive Branch acting on behalf of the small business community. The bill would establish a clear mandate that the Office of Advocacy will fight on behalf of small businesses regardless of the position taken on critical issues by the President and his Administration.

S. 1346 would direct the Chief Counsel to submit an annual report on Federal agency compliance with the Regulatory Flexibility Act to the President and the Senate and House Committees on Small Business. The ''Reg Flex Act'' is a very important weapon in the war against the over-regulation of small businesses. At the request of Senator FRED THOMPSON, Chairman of the Government Affairs Committee, I am offering a noncontroversial amendment to S. 1346 that would direct the Chief Counsel for Advocacy to send a copy of the report to the Senate Government Affairs Committee. In addition, my amendment would also require that copies of the report be sent to the House Committee on Government Reform and the House and Senate Committees on the Judiciary. It makes good sense for each of the committees to receive this report on Reg Flex compliance, and I urge my colleagues to support the amendment.

The Office of Advocacy as envisioned by the ''Independent Office of Advocacy Act'' would be unique with the Executive Branch. The Chief Counsel for Advocacy would be a wide-ranging advocate, who would be free to take positions contrary to the Administration's policies and to advocate change in government programs and attitudes as they impact small businesses. During consideration of the bill, the Committee adopted unanimously an amendment I offered, which was cosponsored by Senator JOHN KERRY, the Committee's Ranking Democrat, to require the Chief Counsel to be appointed ''from civilian life.'' This qualification is intended to emphasize that the person nominated to serve in this important role should have a strong small business background.

In 1976, Congress established the Office of Advocacy in the SBA to be the eyes, ears and voice for small business within the Federal government. Over time, it has been assumed that the Office of Advocacy is the ''independent'' voice for small business. While I strongly believe that the Office of Advocacy and the Chief Counsel should be independent and free to advocate or support positions that might be contrary to the Administration's policies, I have come to find that the Office is not as independent as necessary to do the job for small business.

For example, funding for the Office of Advocacy comes from the Salaries and Expense Account of the SBA's budget. Staffing is allocated by the SBA Administrator to the Office of Advocacy from the overall staff allocation for the Agency. In 1990, there were 70 full-time employees working on behalf of small businesses in the Office of Advocacy. Today's allocation of staff is 49, and fewer are actually on-board as the result of the hiring freeze imposed by the SBA Administrator. The independence of the Office is diminished when the Office of Advocacy staff is reduced to allow for increased staffing for new programs and additional initiatives in other areas of SBA, at the discretion of the Administrator.

In addition, the General Accounting Office (GAO) recently completed a report for me on personnel practices at the SBA (GAO/GGD–99–68). I was alarmed by the GAO's finding that Assistant and Regional Advocates hired by the Office of Advocacy share many of the attributes of Schedule C political appointees. In fact, Regional Advocates are frequently cleared by the White House personnel office—the same procedure followed for approving Schedule C political appointees.

The facts discussed in the GAO Report cast the Office of Advocacy in a whole new light—one that had not been apparent until earlier this year. The report raises the questions, concerns and suspicions regarding the independence of the Office of Advocacy. Has there been a time when the Office did not pursue a matter as vigorously as it might have were it not for direct or indirect political influence? Prior to receipt of the GAO Report, my response was a resounding ''No.'' But now, a question mark arises.

Let me take a moment and note that I will be unrelenting in my efforts to insure the complete independence of the Office of Advocacy in all matters, at all times, for the continued benefit of all small business. However, so long as the Administration controls the budget allocated to the Office of Advocacy and controls who is hired, the independence of the Office may be in jeopardy. We must correct this situation, and the sooner we do it, the better it will be for the small business community.

The ''Independent Office of Advocacy Act'' builds a firewall to prevent the political intrusion into the management of day-to-day operations of the Office of Advocacy. The bill would require that the SBA's budget include a separate account for the Office of Advocacy. No longer would its funds come from the general operating account of the Agency. The separate account would also provide for the number of full-time employees who would work within the Office of Advocacy. No longer would the Chief Counsel for Advocacy have to seek approval from the SBA Administrator to hire staff for the Office of Advocacy.

The bill would also continue the practice of allowing the Chief Counsel to hire individuals critical to the mission of the Office of Advocacy without going through the normal competitive procedures directed by federal law and the Office of Personnel Management (OPM). I believe this special hiring authority, which is limited only to employees within the Office of Advocacy, is beneficial because it allows the Chief Counsel to hire quickly those persons who can best assist the Office in responding to changing issues and problems confronting small businesses.

Mr. President, the ''Independent Office of Advocacy Act'' is a sound bill. It is the product of a great deal of thoughtful, objective review and consideration by me, the staff of the Committee on Small Business, representatives of the small business community, former Chief Counsels for Advocacy and others. These individuals have also devoted much time and effort in actively participating in a Committee Roundtable discussion on the Office of Advocacy, which my Committee held on April 21, 1999. And I stated earlier, the Committee on Small Business approved this bill by a unanimous 17–0 vote. Therefore, I strongly urge my colleagues in the Senate to vote in favor of the ''Independent Office of Advocacy Act.''

Mr. DOMENICI. I ask unanimous consent the committee amendment be agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

(3) to provide a separate authorization for appropriations for the Office;

(4) to authorize the Office to report to the President and to Congress regarding agency compliance with chapter 6 of title 5, United States Code; and

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the ''Continued Reporting of Intercepted Wire, Oral, and Electronic Communications Act''.

SEC. 2. FINDINGS.

Congress makes the following findings:

(1) Section 2519(3) of title 18, United States Code, requires the Director of the Administrative Office of the United States Courts to transmit to Congress a full and complete annual report concerning the number of applications for orders authorizing or approving the interception of wire, oral, or electronic communications. This report is required to include information specified in section 2519(3).

(2) The Federal Reports Elimination and Sunset Act of 1995 provides for the termination of certain laws requiring submittal to Congress of annual, semiannual, and regular periodic reports as of December 21, 1999, 4 years from the effective date of that Act.

(3) Due to the Federal Reports Elimination Act and Sunset Act of 1995, the Administrative Office of United States Courts is not required to submit the annual report described in section 2519(3) of title 18, United States Code, as of December 21, 1999.

SEC. 3. CONTINUED REPORTING REQUIREMENTS.

(a) CONTINUED REPORTING REQUIREMENTS.—Section 2519 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end the following:

''(4) The reports required to be filed by subsection (3) are exempted from the termination provisions of section 3003(a) of the Federal Reports Elimination and Sunset Act of 1995 (Public Law 104–66).''.

(b) EXEMPTION.—Section 3003(d) of the Federal Reports Elimination and Sunset Act of 1995 (Public Law 104–66) is amended—

(1) in paragraph (31), by striking ''or'' at the end;

(2) in paragraph (32), by striking the period and inserting ''; or''; and

(3) by adding at the end the following:

''(33) section 2519(3) of title 18, United States Code.''.

[Section 2519(1)(b)] (a) Section 2519(2)(b) of title 18, United States Code, is amended by striking ''and (iv)'' and inserting ''(iv) the number of orders in which encryption was encountered and whether such encryption prevented law enforcement from obtaining the plain text of communications intercepted pursuant to such order, and (v)''.

(b) The encryption reporting requirement in subsection (a) shall be effective for the report transmitted by the Director of the Administrative Office of the Courts for calendar year 2000 and in subsequent reports.

SEC. 5. REPORTS CONCERNING PEN REGISTERS AND TRAP AND TRACE DEVICES.

Section 3126 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by striking the period and inserting '', which report shall include information concerning—

''(1) the period of interceptions authorized by the order, and the number and duration of any extensions of the order;

''(2) the offense specified in the order or application, or extension of an order;

''(3) the number of investigations involved;

''(4) the number and nature of the facilities affected; and

''(5) the identity, including district, of the applying investigative or law enforcement agency making the application and the person authorizing the order.''.

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, I am pleased that the Senate is today considering S. 1769, which I introduced with Chairman HATCH on October 22, 1999. This bill will continue and enhance the current reporting requirements for the Administrative Office of the Courts and the Attorney General on the eavesdropping and surveillance activities of our federal and state law enforcement agencies.

For many years, the Administrative Office (AO) of the Courts has complied with the statutory requirement, in 18 U.S.C. § 2519(3), to report to Congress annually the number and nature of federal and state applications for orders authorizing or approving the interception of wire, oral or electronic communications. By letter dated September 3, 1999, the AO advised that it would no longer submit this report because ''as of December 21, 1999, the report will no longer be required pursuant to the Federal Reports Elimination and Sunset Act of 1995.'' I commend the AO for alerting Congress that their responsibility for the wiretap reports would lapse at the end of this year, and for doing so in time for Congress to take action.

The AO has done an excellent job of preparing the wiretap reports. We need to continue the AO's objective work in a consistent manner. If another agency took over this important task at this juncture and the numbers came out in a different format, it would immediately generate questions and concerns over the legitimacy and accuracy of the contents of that report.

In addition, it would create difficulties in comparing statistics from prior years going back to 1969 and complicate the job of congressional oversight. Furthermore, transferring this reporting duty to another agency might create delays in issuance of the report since no other agency has the methodology in place. Finally, federal, state and local agencies are well accustomed to the reporting methodology developed by the AO. Notifying all these agencies that the reporting standards and agency have changed would inevitably create more confusion and more expense as law enforcement agencies across the country are forced to learn a new system and develop a liaison with a new agency.

The system in place now has worked well and should be continued. We know how quickly law enforcement may be subjected to criticism over their use of these surreptitious surveillance tools and we should avoid aggravating these sensitivities by changing the reporting agency.

The bill would update the reporting requirements currently in place with one additional reporting requirement. Specifically, the bill would require the wiretap reports prepared beginning in calendar year 2000 to include information on the number of orders in which encryption was encountered and whether such encryption prevented law enforcement from obtaining the plain text of communications intercepted pursuant to such order.

Encryption technology is critical to protect sensitive computer and online information. Yet, the same technology poses challenges to law enforcement when it is exploited by criminals to hide evidence or the fruits of criminal activities. A report by the U.S. Working Group on Organized Crime titled, ''Encryption and Evolving Technologies: Tools of Organized Crime and Terrorism,'' released in 1997, collected anecdotal case studies on the use of encryption in furtherance of criminal activities in order to estimate the future impact of encryption on law enforcement. The report noted the need for ''an ongoing study of the effect of encryption and other information technologies on investigations, prosecutions, and intelligence operations''. As part of this study, ''a database of case information from federal and local law enforcement and intelligence agencies should be established and maintained.'' Adding a requirement that reports be furnished on the number of occasions when encryption is encountered by law enforcement is a far more reliable basis than anecdotal evidence on which to assess law enforcement needs and make sensible policy in this area.

The final section of this bill would codify the information that the Attorney General already provides on pen register and trap and trace device orders, and require further information on where such orders are issued and the types of facilities—telephone, computer, pager or other device—to which the order relates. Under the Electronic Communications Privacy Act (''ECPA'') of 1986, P.L. 99–508, codified at 18 U.S.C. §3126, the Attorney General of the United States is required to report annually to the Congress on the number of pen register orders and orders for trap and trace devices applied for by law enforcement agencies of the Department of Justice. As the original sponsor of ECPA, I believed that adequate oversight of the surveillance activities of federal law enforcement could only be accomplished with reporting requirements such as the one included in this law.

The reports furnished by the Attorney General on an annual basis compile information from five components of the Department of Justice: the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the Drug Enforcement Administration, the Immigration and Naturalization Service, the United States Marshals Service and the Office of the Inspector General. The report contains information on the number of original and extension orders made to the courts for authorization to use both pen register and trap and trace devices, information concerning the number of investigations involved, the offenses on which the applications were predicted and the number of people whose telephone facilities were affected.

These specific categories of information are useful, and the bill we have introduced would direct the Attorney General to continue providing these specific categories of information. In addition, the bill would direct the Attorney General to include information on the identity, including the district, of the agency making the application and the person authorizing the order. In this way, the Congress and the public will be informed of those jurisdictions using this surveillance technique—information which is currently not included in the Attorney General's annual reports.

The requirement for preparation of the wiretap reports will soon lapse so I am delighted to see the Senate take prompt action on this legislation to continue the requirement for submission of the wiretap reports and to update the reporting requirements for both the wiretap reports submitted by the AO and the pen register and trap and trace reports submitted by the Attorney General.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the committee amendments be agreed to, the bill be considered read for a third time and passed, the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table, and any statements relating to the bill be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill (S. 1769), as amended, was read the third time and passed, as follows:

S. 1769

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

This report is required to include information specified in section 2519(3).

(2) The Federal Reports Elimination and Sunset Act of 1995 provides for the termination of certain laws requiring submittal to Congress of annual, semiannual, and regular periodic reports as of December 21, 1999, 4 years from the effective date of that Act.

(3) Due to the Federal Reports Elimination Act and Sunset Act of 1995, the Administrative Office of United States Courts is not required to submit the annual report described in section 2519(3) of title 18, United States Code, as of December 21, 1999.

SEC. 5. REPORTS CONCERNING PEN REGISTERS AND TRAP AND TRACE DEVICES.

Mrs. BOXER. Mr. President, for several months, I have been working on a case with the South Korean government on behalf of a family in California.

The family, Mr. and Mrs. B.K. Cho, are concerned about actions taken against them in South Korea in 1984. At that time, the Cho family owned one of the largest construction companies in the country. The Cho family alleges that their holdings were illegally transferred to two other companies, Cho Hung Bank and Daelim Industries. They also accuse officials of the then Chun government of ordering this transfer.

Soon after their property was taken from them, the Cho family left for the United States. They have filed a lawsuit in California against Cho Hung Bank and Daelim Industries and their U.S. subsidiaries.

Because of the strong concerns I have about this case, I had asked that this particular treaty be delayed until I had the opportunity to further explore this matter. One of the concerns raised by the family was that the Korean Ministry of Foreign Affairs and Trade (MOFAT) had not served the court petition to the Cho Hung Bank and Daelim Industries. I have now been assured that this action has been taken. I ask unanimous consent that a letter dated September 22, 1999 from the First Secretary of the Congressional Section of the South Korean Embassy be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EMBASSY OF THE REPUBLIC OF KOREA,
Washington, DC, September 22, 1999.

Mr. SEAN MOORE,
Office of Senator Barbara Boxer,
U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. MOORE, in reference to my letter dated August 6, 1999, concerning the case of Mr. Cho Bong-Koo, I am pleased to inform you that, according to the Korean Ministry of Foreign Affairs and Trade (MOFAT), the Cho Hung Bank and the Daelim Industrial Company have each received a court petition at the end of August.

The Embassy has also learned that these two entities are planning to establish legal counsel to represent their interests regarding this lawsuit. As was mentioned in the attached letter dated August 24, 1998 and addressed to Senator Boxer, the Korean Government is of the view that any remaining questions in transferring the management of Samho in the 1980's should be settled through legal procedures in court.

I thank you again for your interests and concern.

Sincerely yours,

CHANG BEOM KIM,
First Secretary,
Congressional Section.

Mrs. BOXER. Mr. President, I also have received assurances from the South Korean Ambassador, Dr. Lee Hong-koo, that his government will not interfere with the pending court case and expresses hope that legal proceedings will be conducted as quickly as possible.

I ask unanimous consent that a letter to me dated November 5, 1999 from Ambassador Lee be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EMBASSY OF THE REPUBLIC OF KOREA,
Washington, DC, November 5, 1999.

Hon. BARBARA BOXER,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR BOXER, I would like to take this opportunity to express my appreciation for your support for the ratification of the U.S.-Korea Extradition Treaty.

I would also like to commend you on your efforts to assist your Korean-American constituent, Mr. Cho Bong-Koo, who has filed suit in the Los Angeles Superior Court against several Korean corporations.

I understand your concerns about this case and have considered it with the utmost gravity. Given our respect for the integrity of the U.S. legal system, it is inappropriate for the Embassy or any Korean government official to interfere in a case pending in your courts. However, in view of the long duration of this matter of concern to the Cho family, I remain hopeful that the legal proceedings will be conducted in a timely manner, so that the case may be resolved without delay.

Please be assured that I understand your endeavor to help ameliorate your constituent's concerns. As a public servant in a democratic government, I fully recognize the importance of your efforts. It is my belief that we will continue to work well together on future matters.

Sincerely,

LEE HONG-KOO,
Ambassador.

Mrs. BOXER. Mr. President, I support this treaty and will allow it to be cleared by the full Senate. I will continue to work with the Cho family and the South Korean government and hope that it can be resolved in a timely matter.

MEDICARE COVERAGE OF PRESCRIPTION DRUGS

Mr. WYDEN. Mr. President, I have been coming to the floor now on a number of occasions, as we move toward the end of our work for this year, in an effort to try to build bipartisan support for ensuring that senior citizens can get prescription drugs under their Medicare.

There is one bipartisan bill now before the Senate. It is the legislation that Senator SNOWE and I have introduced together. Fifty-four Members of the Senate have voted for this bill. It seems so sad that the Senate cannot come together on an issue such as this and provide some real relief for the Nation's older people.

So as part of this effort to get bipartisan support for legislation to cover seniors for their prescription drug bills, I have come to the floor and urged seniors to send in copies of their prescription drug bills, to send in copies of their bills to all of us here in the Senate in Washington, DC. I hope that in doing that, it will help generate some awareness about how serious a problem this really is for the Nation's older people.

As I have done on previous occasions, I come to the floor to discuss some of these letters. This afternoon, I want to take a couple of minutes to talk about a handful of the letters I have received from senior citizens in my hometown of Portland. We have read from letters from seniors across the State of Oregon in the past. Today, I thought I would look to my hometown and describe a little bit about what the seniors are faced with in terms of trying to pay these prescription bills.

One elderly widow wrote me in the last couple of days from Portland to describe her situation as one where she has a monthly income of $806. She spends about $150 of that monthly income on her prescriptions. She indicates she is having problems paying for these very large prescription drug bills. When asked by our staff what she does in a situation such as this, she just said: I do without and pray. That was her response to the question of making sure she could get help with her prescriptions. She goes on to say, when we asked her about choosing between food and fuel and health care—we have literally millions of our Nation's seniors today walking on an economic tightrope, balancing these costs, medical bills against their fuel bills. When we asked her how she handled the situation with respect to her medicine, she said: I just wait. I always pay the utilities first.

Now, this isn't some kind of statistic or abstract kind of matter that the think tanks are debating here in the beltway. This is a senior citizen back home in Portland, my hometown. She has a monthly income of $806. She spends $150 of it on her prescription medicines. When she can't afford her prescriptions, she writes me: I just do without and pray.

How is it that a country as rich and strong and powerful as ours can't provide some relief to an elderly widow with an income of $806 a month, spending more than $150 of it on her prescriptions and literally having to pray she will get some help with her medical bills? How is it that our country, so strong and so good, can't come up with a plan to help an elderly widow such as this?

Senator SNOWE and I are part of a bipartisan team trying to address it. The Snowe-Wyden legislation has garnered 54 votes on the floor of the Senate in terms of its funding plan. Already a majority of the Senate is on record as saying this is an appropriate way to try to fund a prescription drug benefit for older people. I am concerned—this is right at the heart of the philosophy behind the Snowe-Wyden legislation—that if we don't act, and act in a bipartisan way, in this session of the Congress before we wrap up our business next year, it will be years before older people get some help with their prescription drugs.

I am very often asked at town hall meetings and other gatherings whether our Nation can afford to cover prescription drugs. My view is, we cannot afford not to cover these prescription drugs. Not only are we hearing about the suffering in these letters I keep bringing to the floor of the Senate, but we are seeing in so many instances that if older people could get just a little bit of help with their prescription drug costs, that would help our country save much more expensive medical bills down the road.

I have repeatedly cited on this floor the anticoagulant drugs. That seems to me a particularly good example. The evidence shows that if older people can get help with some of these anticoagulant medicines—the cost might be $1,000 a year for help with anticoagulant medicines—they could save the cost they might incur if they suffer a stroke as a result of not getting their medicines. Those costs can be upwards of $100,000 a year. That is, in effect, the kind of challenge with which we are faced. Either we address this issue on a bipartisan basis—that is what the Snowe-Wyden legislation is all about—or we continue to have our senior citizens suffering, whether it is in Alabama, Oregon, or any other State. This is an area where we can work in a bipartisan way.

In the Snowe-Wyden legislation, we reject price controls. This isn't a run from Washington, one-size-fits-all Federal approach. We try to use marketplace forces, the ingenuity of the marketplace to give senior citizens some clout. It is a model we all know something about. Federal employees in Alabama and Oregon use the Federal Employees Health Benefits Plan. It is marketplace oriented. It gives folks choices and options and alternatives. That is the model behind the Snowe-Wyden legislation.

Our bill is called SPICE, the Senior Prescription Insurance Coverage Equity Act. With a majority of the Senate already having voted for a funding plan for the program, we think that is the way to proceed.

As seniors hear us on the floor of the Senate talking about this issue and urging that folks send us copies of their prescription drug bills to the Senate in Washington, DC, they may have other ideas than the Snowe-Wyden legislation. The important thing is, there is no reason this Senate cannot come together in a bipartisan fashion and act in a way to provide real and meaningful relief to the Nation's older people.

I will cite another couple of examples of older people who have been writing us in recent days. An elderly gentleman from Portland, again, describes taking five drugs, a lot of them very familiar—Minocin, nitroglycerin for blood pressure, for heart ailments connected with diabetes. This gentleman has a monthly income of about $900. He is spending about $170 from his monthly income on prescriptions.

We talked to him about what it means for him to be in this kind of financial crunch where, out of a monthly income of $900, $170 of it goes for prescriptions. He reports that if he could have a little bit of help with his prescriptions, he would have money for other things he describes as clothing.

So we are not talking about seniors getting help with their prescriptions and then suddenly using it for some sort of luxury or something that might be considered nonessential. These seniors are talking about not having enough money to pay for essentials. When they can't get help for their prescription drugs, such as this elderly gentleman in Portland, this gentleman said, in effect, he can't afford his clothing. He cannot afford clothing.

Of course, that, to some extent, is a health-related kind of matter because older people are susceptible to illness. This is getting to be the colder part of the year. These are folks who, if they can't get adequate clothing, may pick up illnesses as a result of not being able to afford warm clothes.

What we are talking about may not be of great importance to some of these think tanks in Washington. I have seen they are putting out all kinds of reports that this is not all that important to seniors. I talk to senior citizens at home in Oregon. The seniors we are talking to know these are real problems. What they want to see is the Senate deal with them in a bipartisan kind of fashion. They want to see us get beyond some of the bickering and the finger pointing.

The Snowe-Wyden legislation is built on that principle. We don't want to see the U.S. Senate duck this issue, have it go out on the campaign trail where Democrats will attack the Republicans and Republicans will attack back. That is really easy. It is easy to take issues like this, using the campaign fodder for advertisements. What is tough is crafting bipartisan legislation.

So I am very hopeful that seniors, as this poster says, will send in copies of their prescription drug bills to us here in the Senate in Washington, DC. Instead of having to come to the floor of the Senate day after day, as I have, I can come to the floor of the Senate and talk about being proud of working with my colleagues on a bipartisan basis to address this issue.

Before I wrap this up for this afternoon, I wanted to mention one other account that came to Tualatin just outside Portland at home in Oregon. This was an elderly couple, they spend about $300 a month on their prescription drugs. They are taking 11 prescriptions. They report that they are retired but are trying to work to pay for prescriptions. The husband is over 65 and he is trying to work now in order to pay their prescription drug bills of $300 a month. This is an elderly couple in Tualatin, OR. None of it is covered by health insurance. They report to us that they are cutting down on other essentials that are important to them, but they are going to keep working. The husband is going to keep working simply to pay the couple's prescription drug bills.

Think about that for a moment, the three cases I have read from today: An elderly widow who can't pay her prescription drug bills without great hardship with an income of $806 a month, with $150 for prescriptions. She says, ''I just do without and pray.'' Next is an elderly gentlemen from Portland, with a monthly income of $900 a month, and he is spending about $170 of it on prescription drugs. He says he hopes to be able to get some coverage so he would be able to afford some clothing —an essential, especially as we move into the cold weather season. And then, finally, is the couple I just mentioned with $300 a month in prescription drug bills, with the husband not in good health but continuing to work solely to pay for their prescriptions.

I think it is so sad that when we have had a majority in the Senate go on record as voting for a plan to fund this important benefit for the elderly, when I know there are Senators of good will on both sides of the aisle who would like to work on a marketplace solution to covering prescription drugs for seniors, the Senate can't come together and deal with it. The fact is, our senior citizens are getting creamed with respect to their prescription drug bills, and it happens two ways. First, Medicare never covered prescriptions when the program began in 1965. I guess the architects didn't think it would be all that important.

As I have said on the floor of the Senate, it is more important today than it used to be because many of these drugs help to lower bills because they are preventive in nature. In addition to Medicare not covering prescriptions, what is happening today is if you are a senior citizen in Alabama, or in Oregon, and you walk into a drugstore in a small town in Oregon or in the State of the Presiding Officer, that senior citizen who walks into the drugstore, in effect, subsidizes the big buyers of medicine. If you are a health maintenance organization in Oregon, or in any other State, you can go out and negotiate a discount. You can go out and negotiate a good price on your medicine. You have clout in the marketplace. But if you are a senior citizen who just walks into a drugstore, you don't have any bargaining power, you don't have any clout. So, in effect, that senior citizen who walks into a pharmacy is subsidizing the big buyers in the community, the health maintenance organizations that can negotiate a discount. Those seniors are getting creamed twice. Medicare doesn't cover it, and then they have to subsidize the big buyers.

So I intend to keep coming to the floor of the Senate, continuing to bring to light these various kinds of real-life examples from home in Oregon. I hope seniors, as this poster indicates, will send us copies of their prescription drug bills. I want to hear from them. I want folks who are listening to the work of the Senate and are following this to send me and my colleagues copies of your prescription drug bills. Send it to us, each of us here, as the poster says, in Washington, DC.

I want you to do it for just one reason: I think this is the kind of problem that we are sent here to deal with. This is not some trifling, inconsequential matter. This is a question of whether we are going to respond to the more than 20 percent of the Nation's senior citizens who are walking on an economic tightrope every year, spending more than $1,000 a year out-of-pocket on prescriptions, balancing food costs against fuel costs, and fuel costs against their medical costs. As I have said again and again, they are giving up medicines that are essential to their health.

I mentioned yesterday older people with diabetes who can't afford the Glucophage, an essential diabetes drug. This is not something that is inconsequential; this is something that, for older people, can literally mean the difference between decent health or incurring a very, very serious illness and, often, even death.

Let us not be indifferent to the plight of those older people. They are asking the Senate for action. The bipartisan Snowe-Wyden legislation is one approach that I happen to favor. But I am sure our colleagues have other ideas. What is unacceptable to me, though, is to just say that this Senate won't take it up, we will save it for the campaign trail of 2000, we will tackle it another day. We ought to tackle it now. This has been an issue and a concern of the Nation's older people since back in the days when I was director of the Gray Panthers at home in Oregon. But it is getting to be an even bigger concern because more and more older people can't afford their medicine, and with more seniors interested in wellness and trying to stay healthy, this is the time for the United States Senate to act.

So I intend to keep coming back again and again to the floor of the Senate, and I hope seniors will send in copies of their prescription drug bills. I am proud there is a bipartisan bill now before the Senate to deal with this issue, the Snowe-Wyden legislation. I hope that seniors will be in contact with us, give us their ideas on whether they think our bill is the way to go, or if they prefer another route. What is unacceptable to me is for the Senate to duck this issue. We have an opportunity to work in a bipartisan fashion on it. I intend to keep coming back to the floor of the Senate again and again until we get that action.

With that, I yield the floor.

COPS AND METRO ALLIANCE CELEBRATE 25 YEARS OF SUCCESSFUL POLITICAL ACTION

HON. CIRO D. RODRIGUEZ

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, November 4, 1999

Mr. RODRIGUEZ. Mr. Speaker, I am truly honored to recognize the 25th anniversary of the founding of an organization that changed the political landscape in San Antonio, across Texas and the Nation. From the alleys of San Antonio's poorest South and West Side neighborhoods, people of faith and conviction came together a quarter century ago to form Communities Organized for Public Service, or COPS.

COPS, and later its sister organization, Metro Alliance, entered the scene at a time when the largely minority, poor communities of San Antonio did not have a voice at the table. Frustrated by inaction, and worse by a lack of attention from the establishment leadership, COPS and Metro Alliance became the voice of the unheard, the mouth of those who were ignored.

COPS and Metro Alliance draw their strength from the people and institutions that make up the local neighborhoods: churches, schools, and other community-based organizations. We hear a great deal of talk today about the need for faith-based groups to take responsibility, but the truth of the matter is that COPS and Metro Alliance long ago accepted that challenge. The result has been a thousand victories, each one building on the last, with more than 40 religious congregations working together.

COPS first set out to repair the imbalance in distribution of funds for city improvements. They rightly demanded that poor neighborhoods deserved flood control and street improvements. Later COPS fought in the battle to bring single-member districts to San Antonio, helping end the legacy of a system that did not adequately seat minorities, who by this time were a majority of the local population, at the table of power.

In recent years, COPS and Metro Alliance, recognizing that education is the cornerstone of any future success, focus their energies on job training and early childhood education. Project QUEST and the San Antonio Education Partnership are models for improving the lives of communities one person at a time.

The positive impact of these organizations reaches far beyond the banks of the San Antonio River. By joining with the Industrial Areas Foundation, sister groups began to spring forth across Texas, and then other areas of the country. From city to city, the basic principles were established—that local communities could organize themselves to create a political force that could not be ignored.

Today, similar organizations exist in Dallas, El Paso, Houston, the Rio Grande Valley, and communities in New Mexico, Arizona, Louisiana, Nebraska, Iowa, and southern California. On November 7, delegates from each of these areas, some 5,000 in number, will convene in San Antonio to celebrate 25 years of successful political action on behalf of the less fortunate. Their work has improved the living and working conditions of countless thousands of low- and moderate-income families.

All my colleagues in the House of Representatives should be proud of the work performed by COPS, Metro Alliance, and their sister organizations across the country. Ordinary people doing extraordinary work is the best way to describe them. I am proud to share in their accomplishments and look forward to years of future growth and success.

''WATER 2000''

HON. DAVID D. PHELPS

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, November 4, 1999

Mr. PHELPS. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to the Hamilton County Water District and to bring attention to the ''Water 2000'' celebration taking place on November 12, of this year, at the Veterans of Foreign Wars Hall in McLeansboro, Illinois. The Hamilton County Water District will be the first water district in Illinois, and one of the first in the nation, to supply all rural residents who desire water during the year 2000.

Prior to the formation of the Hamilton County Water District in 1978, the population centers in that region had treated waters, but the rural residents depended upon wells, cisterns, or ponds as a source of water. The Hamilton County Water District realized this inequity, and pushed forward to supply these residents with suitable drinking water on par with their more urban counterparts. In the coming year, the final ''Water 2000'' expansion by the Hamilton County Water District, will complete a total 350 miles of water mains that will serve 1,230 rural customers. Funding for these various expansions include U.S. Department of Agriculture, U.S. Economic Development Association, the Illinois Department of Commerce and Community Affairs, the Illinois Department of Natural Resources and the Illinois Rural Bond Bank.

Mr. Speaker, I am especially pleased about the ''Water 2000'' celebration and what it stands for. I come from a rural part of the country, where many rural residents sometimes lack basic services such as potable water, that many Americans in more urban areas take for granted. This great accomplishment by the Hamilton County Water District, and all the agencies and individuals who worked to this goal, is one worthy of commemoration in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and a milestone for rural residents all over this country.

TRIBUTE TO GENERAL ANDREW T. MCNAMARA

HON. JAMES P. MORAN

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, November 4, 1999

Mr. MORAN of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, General McNamara was the first Director of Defense Supply Agency (DSA, now DLA), 1961–1963. As Director, he distinguished himself as an innovator in developing ways to support the troops at the least cost to the taxpayer. His efforts in standardizing DSA managed items earned him the First Oak Leaf Cluster to the Distinguished Service Medal for exceptionally meritorious service for his leadership as Agency Head.

He established a Cost Reduction Program to prove that DSA could maintain effective supply support to the Armed Forces at less cost to the taxpayer. In FY63, the program saved $61.8M in direct cost and approximately an additional $261M in inventory draw down. That program laid the groundwork for DLA's current better, faster, lower cost logistics solutions.

He was instrumental in introducing a wholesale distribution system for assigned supplies which provided an integrated network of distribution facilities for all DSA commodities to be operated under uniform procedures, the basics of which are still used today.

He established the Logistics Readiness Center (LRC) during the Cuban crisis, which provided an overall focal point with the Agency for efficient, economical, and responsive support of the Military Services and unified commands emergency and contingency operations. Today, the LRC is an integral part of DLA's emergency operations and played a vital role in supporting the efforts in Bosnia, Desert Storm, and Haiti.

Other awards:

Legion of Merit (England) for exceptional service in providing Quartermaster supplies to U.S. forces in Tunisia and for adapting Quartermaster transportation facilities to move troops and ammunition.

Bronze Star Medal for his part in planning the invasion of Normandy.

Distinguished Service Medal for directing Quartermaster operations of the First Army during its drive across France, Belgium and Germany.

At 94 years old, renaming the HQ Complex in his honor would be a living tribute to someone who has distinguished himself as a pioneer in Defense supply management as well as a distinguished member of the Armed Forces.

TRIBUTE TO MARY LOU TULLOS GARCIA

HON. SOLOMON P. ORTIZ

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, November 4, 1999

Mr. ORTIZ. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to commend and pay tribute to Mary Lou Tullos Garcia of Harlingen, a woman who does the most important work in our society, teaching our children. Mary Lou has been selected as the recipient of the National Mujer Award by the National Hispana Leadership Institute (NHLI).

The Mujer Award pays tribute to the sustained lifetime achievement of a woman of Hispanic descent who has made significant contributions to the empowerment and well-being of the Hispanic community. Last year's winner of this award was Dr. Antonia Novello, former Surgeon General of the United States.

Mary Lou was chosen for this award for her dedication and her work improving the schools and schooling for the severely and profoundly disabled children and youth and for tending to the needs of their families. NHLI, in conferring the award, said that Mary Lou exemplified the vigor and strengths of ''La Mujer Latina.''

The NHLI also says that the award recognizes a woman of Hispanic descent who has served her community well, and acted with justice, love and the deepest of pride in her culture.

I am enormously proud of Mary Lou Tullos Garcia for her commitment during her lifetime to those less fortunate than many of us. Our educators in this country are always my heroes because of the hard work they do every single day to teach the next generation of Americans.

But, today I am particularly proud of Mary Lou for her dedication to teaching those who are the hardest to teach, and sometimes the hardest to each. The Harlingen community is richer for her presence in the public schools. The lives and families she has touched have benefitted mightily from her work. She indeed embodies the attributes of a Hispanic woman who labors every day, without credit, to make better the community in which she lives.

National Hispana Leadership Institute is the only leadership development program in the United States focusing exclusively on the development of Hispanic women who are leaders. It prepares Hispanic women for positions of national influence, public policy and advancing the national Hispanic community.

The awarded will be conferred at a black-tie gala on Friday, November 12, at the Walt Disney World/Epcot Center in Orlando, Florida. I ask my colleagues to join me in commending Mary Lou Tullos Garcia for receiving this prominent award.

HONORING BERNA DALLONS

HON. LOIS CAPPS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, November 4, 1999

Mrs. CAPPS. Mr. Speaker, today I rise to inform my colleagues of an outstanding constituent who has spent most of her life dedicated to higher education. Ms. Berna Dallons has been named benefactor of the year by the Council for Resource Development for her significant contributions to resource development at Cuesta College. Recipients of this award embody the ideals of philanthropy, leadership, and volunteerism in their service to the nation's 1,200 community, technical and junior colleges.

As a longtime community leader, educator, and member of the Foundation Board of Director, Ms. Dallons led Cuesta's first ever capital fund drive, after serving on the College's Blue Ribbon Site Selection Committee. In July 1996, Ms. Dallons, with her husband John, offered the college a lease option for land for the North County Campus, and over the next three years, personally contributed over $250,000 to the Campaign for Cuesta. As a volunteer leader, Berna Dallons led the charge to build a North County Campus with the support of 2000 volunteers, raising more than $2,000,000 in two years for a campus serving 2,000 students.

Mr. Speaker, Berna has taken community service to the highest level. I applaud the National Council for Resource Development on its choice for this award and I feel so privileged and proud to have this opportunity to recognize Ms. Dallons on behalf of the United States Congress. Berna, I commend you for your service to the community that we share and to our Nation.

WTO MINISTERIAL CONFERENCE

HON. PETER J. VISCLOSKY

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, November 4, 1999

Mr. VISCLOSKY. Mr. Speaker, under Article I, Section 7 of the Constitution, the House of Representatives has the authority to originate revenue provisions; not the Senate, the Administration, or the U.S. Trade Representative. Later this month, the United States will host a Ministerial Conference of the World Trade Organization (WTO) in Seattle, Washington. The Ministerial is expected to launch a new round of multilateral trade negotiations, based on a ''built-in agenda'' established in the Uruguay Round agreements which Congress ratified in 1994. That build-in agenda, which I wholeheartedly support, includes revisiting the existing WTO rules for agricultural trade, services trade, and intellectual property protection. Many of our trading partners have indicated that they would like to reopen the five year old agreement on Antidumping (AD) and Countervailing Duty (CVD) laws. By not giving the Administration the clear message from Congress that AD and CVD laws are not to be placed on the table for negotiations, we are essentially allowing the Administration to act on authority it does not have.

Dumped products are levied a tariff under existing U.S. law. These tariffs are revenue raisers which are paid directly to the U.S. Treasury. By allowing negotiations to be made which weaken our trade laws and let in more dumped products, the House would be turning over power to the Executive Branch given to it exclusively under the Constitution. Trade agreements and international treaties, as signed by the Administration, are binding under international law, whether or not they are approved by Congress. Article 6 of the original General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT), signed in 1947, declares that dumping ''shall not be condoned.''

This resolution has privilege because only the House has the authority to alter existing revenue provisions. Allowing the Administration to negotiate AD and CVD laws would further diminish the loss of constitutional power the House has suffered over time. Strong antidumping and antisubsidy rules are a cornerstone of the liberal trade policy of the United States and are essential to the health of the manufacturing and farm sectors in the United States. Abolishing AD and CVD would remove these sectors from the U.S. economy, and lead to economic disaster.

Additionally, according to Article I, Section 8 of the Constitution, the Congress has the power and responsibility to regulate foreign commerce and the conduct of international trade negotiations. An important part of Congress' participation in the formulation of trade policy is the enactment of official negotiating objectives against which completed agreements can be measured when presented for ratification.

Congress exercised that power in 1994 when it ratified the agenda for the Seattle WTO Ministerial, which included agricultural trade, services trade, and intellectual property protection. The agenda, enacted into Federal Law as P.L. 103–465, did not include antidumping or antisubsidy rules. More than 225 Members of Congress are concerned that a few countries are seeking to circumvent the agreed list of negotiation topics and reopen debate over the WTO's antidumping and antisubsidy rules. Congress has not approved new negotiations on antidumping or antisubsidy rules and has clearly, but so far informally, signaled its opposition to such negotiations. It has long been and remains the policy of the United States, as well as the international community, to support its antidumping and antisubsidy laws and to defend those laws in international negotiations. In fact, Article 6 of the original General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT), signed in 1947, declares that dumping ''shall not be condoned.''

Furthermore, Section 702 of House Rule IX, entitled ''General Principles,'' concluded that certain matters of business arising under the Constitution mandatory in nature for the House have been held to have a privilege which superseded the rules establishing the order of business. This is a question of the House's Constitutional authority and is therefore privileged in nature. In the 105th Congress, the House ruled favorably on a measure which contained a constitutional question similar to the one before it now. On March 5, 1998, the House held that H. Res. 379, a resolution which stated that only the House had the authority to originate a revenue provision, had privilege under Rule IX, and then approved the resolution. This resolution was in response to a Senate measure which infringed upon the House's constitutional duty by repealing a revenue provision and replacing it with a user fee. H. Res. 379 had privilege before the House because the Senate provision was a revenue reducing measure. The question of privilege currently before the House concerns the same principle. A trade agreement signed by the President commits the United States and is binding under international law, even if the Congress never ratifies it. Eliminating or weakening AD or CVD laws would reduce United States Treasury receipts, thus reducing overall revenue. If these laws are placed on the table for negotiations, it would give the Administration the authority to commit the United States to agreements under power it does not have. For these reasons, my motion has privilege.

The WTO antidumping and antisubsidy rules concluded in the Uruguay Round have scarcely been tested since they entered into effect and certainly have not proved defective. Opening these rules to renegotiation could only lead to weakening them, which would in turn lead to an even greater abuse of the world's open markets, particularly that of the United States. Avoiding another divisive fight over these rules is the best way to promote progress on the other, far more important, issues facing WTO members; and it is therefore essential that negotiations on these antidumping and antisubsidy matters not be reopened under the auspices of the WTO or otherwise. Under present circumstances, launching a negotiation that includes antidumping and antisubsidy issues would affect the rights of the House and the integrity of its proceedings.

A precedent exists for bringing H. Res. 298 out of committee and to the House floor immediately. On October 26, 1999, H. Con. Res. 190 was brought to the floor under suspension of the rules because it concerned the upcoming Seattle Round. This measure only had 13 co-sponsors, while H. Res. 298 has 228 cosponsors. The majority of the House should be heard.

Two hundred and twenty-nine Members of the House of Representatives call upon the President: not to participate in any international negotiation in which antidumping or antisubsidy rules are part of the negotiating agenda; to refrain from submitting for congressional approval agreements that require changes to the current antidumping and countervailing duty laws and enforcement policies of the United States; and to enforce the antidumping and countervailing duty laws vigorously in all pending and future cases.

Mr. Speaker, this debate today is not about the merits of my resolution, nor is it about the 228 cosponsors who would like to see this matter resolved before the House. My question of privilege regards the sanctity of our proceedings as a House. The U.S. Constitution conveys upon this body the power to originate revenue provisions. It is not only our responsibility, it is our duty and obligation to send a clear message to the Administration that the United States House of Representatives will not weaken its trade laws. We need to live up to our obligations.

Mr. Speaker, since a majority of the Members of this House have signed onto the original resolution as cosponsors, I ask the Speaker to recognize any Member wishing to speak on the resolution.

HONORING THE SUFFOLK COUNTY AHRC

HON. MICHAEL P. FORBES

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, November 4, 1999

Mr. FORBES. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to express my warmest wishes and congratulations to the Suffolk County Chapter of the Association for the Help of Retarded Children and to its honorees; Robert R. McMillan and Marvin L. Colson. Over the last 50 years, the Suffolk County AHRC has dedicated itself to providing educational and vocational training to both children and adults with disabilities. It gives these children and adults unique opportunities that they may otherwise have never been exposed to, and it focuses on improving all aspects of their lives. The AHRC's commitment to people with disabilities has helped and will continue to ensure that they are provided with the best care and training to further enhance their lives, and its exemplary record should serve as a shining example for all other such organizations.

This year's honorees have also proven their commitment to Long Island and people with disabilities and should be commended for their work. As the founder and chairman of the Long Island Housing Partnership, Inc., Robert R. McMillan has been devoted to creating affordable housing. As the director of the Long Island Development Disabilities, Marvin L. Colson has dedicated over 26 years to serving the disabled. Once again, I would like to congratulate and thank the AHRC and its honorees for all they have done for Suffolk County.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

HON. SUE WILKINS MYRICK

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, November 4, 1999

Mrs. MYRICK. Mr. Speaker, I missed 3 recorded votes on November 1, 1999 while I was working in my district. If I had been present, I would have voted as follows:

Rollcall vote 552, on the motion to suspend the rules and pass H.R. 1714, Electronic Signatures in Global and National Commerce Act, I would have voted ''yes''.

Rollcall vote 551, on the motion to suspend the rules and pass H.R. 2737, the Land Conveyance, Lewis and Clark National Historic Trail, I would have voted ''yes''.

Rollcall vote 550, on the motion to susped the rules and pass H.R. 348, to authorize a national civil defense and emergency management memorial, I would have voted ''yes''.

THE LITERACY INVOLVES FAMILIES TOGETHER ACT

HON. WILLIAM F. GOODLING

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, November 4, 1999

Mr. GOODLING. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing a bill to improve programs for family literacy, better known as LIFT (Literacy Involves Families Together). The purpose of this legislation is to improve the quality of services provided under the Even Start Family Literacy Program and other Federal programs providing family literacy services.

As the author of the Even Start Family Literacy Program when it was first enacted in 1988, I want to be sure that the services provided to program participants are of the highest quality. Family literacy programs that are intensive and provide participants with high quality services are a very effective means of breaking the cycle of illiteracy that occurs in many families.

As we all know, parental support is instrumental to a child's academic success. Unfortunately, there are many parents who are unable to support their child's education because they themselves have dropped out of school or have a low level of literacy. Family literacy programs provide adult education services to parents and, at the same time, help ensure that their children do not fall behind in school. By working with parents and children at the same time, family literacy programs have successfully helped parents reduce their dependency on Federal assistance, obtain employment, or even advance in their current jobs. For children, the picture is just as bright. Children who participate in family literacy programs with their parents perform well in school.

Mr. Speaker, the legislation I am introducing will improve family literacy programs through several important changes to current law. For example, this legislation would authorize and provide funding for a research project to find the most effective ways to improve literacy among adults with reading difficulties. The National Institute for Child Health and Human Development has provided us with high quality scientific research on the best method for teaching children to read and the bill requires instructional programs for children to be based on scientifically based reading research. Unfortunately, there is no comparable body of research on teaching reading to adults. And yet, the statistics on adult illiteracy in this country are staggering.

According to the National Adult Literacy Survey, 40 million adults, or 20 percent of the U.S. adult population, scored at the lowest of five levels of literacy. In real terms, this means that 40 million adults struggle to maintain good jobs, have a difficult time supporting their children's education, and have poor participation rates in community activities. In order to have high quality family literacy programs, we need to ensure the instruction provided to both adult and child participants is based on sound scientific research on reading. By authorizing research on how adults learn to read as a part of this legislation, we are taking a positive step in this direction.

In addition, the LIFT Act would help raise the quality of family literacy programs by allowing States to use a portion of their Even Start dollars to provide training and technical assistance to Even Start providers. States would provide such training through a grant, contract, or other agreement with an organization experienced in providing quality training and technical assistance to family literacy instructors. States could not, however, reduce the level of service to program participants in order to provide such training and technical assistance.

The LIFT Act would also permit Even Start projects to operate for more than 8 years. I have heard from many projects that they will have difficulty continuing to operate once Federal support for their project is totally eliminated. As such, the LIFT Act would allow projects to receive Federal support for more than 8 years, but would reduce the level of support to 35 percent of the cost of operating the project. States would, however, be able to eliminate funding for any project if it did not meet program goals and State indicators of program quality.

The final change I want to highlight is a provision which would focus additional program dollars on high needs populations. Once funding for the Even Start Family Literacy Program reaches $250 million, a total of 6 percent of funding would be reserved to serve migrants and Native Americans. These are some of our most vulnerable families and I believe it is most appropriate to use additional funds to serve their needs. At the present time, a total of 5 percent of program dollars are reserved for Even Start projects for migrants and Native Americans.

Mr. Speaker, these are but a few of the highlights of this important legislation. Its enactment will ensure the long-term success of Even Start and other family literacy programs operated with Federal funds by providing for quality improvements. I urge my colleagues to join me in support of this legislation.

HONORING UAW LOCAL 599'S 60TH ANNIVERSARY AND THE RECIPIENTS OF THE ''WALTER P. REUTHER DISTINGUISHED SERVICE AWARD''

HON. DEBBIE STABENOW

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, November 4, 1999

Ms. STABENOW. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to recognize the 60th anniversary of UAW Local 599 which will be celebrated on November 6, 1999, and the men and women who will receive the ''Walter P. Reuther Distinguished Service Award.''

The same solidarity that began in 1937 and 44 days later resulted in the first major industry wide contract in the United States is still thriving today. During those 44 days and nights the members of the fledgling UAW and the Flint community forged an alliance which has endured for the past 60 years. The brothers and sisters of Local 599 continue to give back to the community that played such a pivotal role in their success. Local 599 has collected over $1 million to help provide community residents with shelter, food, clothing, and medical care. They have coordinated the Marine Toys For Tots program which has given 10,000 children the overwhelming joy and excitement of a Christmas morning surprise for the past 10 years. The list of organizations to which they have given is long and includes the United Way, Easter Seals, American Cancer Society, Good Will, and the Salvation Army.

The ''Walter P. Reuther Distinguished Service Award'' is being presented to Robert Aidif, David Aiken, Dale Bingley, Dennis Carl, Jesse Collins, Russell W. Cook, Harvey ''Whitey'' De Groot, Patrick Dolan, Larry Farlin, Maurice ''Mo'' Felling, Ted Henderson, Ken Mead, Frank Molina, Shirley Prater, Gene Ridley, John D. Rogers, Dale Scanlon, G. Jean Garza-Smith, Robbie Stevens, Nick Vukovich, Jerry Ward, Greg Wheeler, Don Wilson, Tom Worden, and James Yaklin in recognition of 20 years of recorded service in an elective office in the local union. These individuals have served their union brothers and sisters of UAW Local 599 and their communities with unparalleled devotion and perseverance.

I would like to thank the men and women receiving the ''Walter P. Reuther Distinguished Service Award'' for their contributions and UAW Local 599 for 60 years of solidarity not only within the plant, but throughout the community. The union brothers and sisters of UAW Local 599 epitomize the values that have made our Nation great.

WOMEN'S HEALTH AND CANCER RIGHTS CONFORMING AMENDMENTS OF 1999

HON. SUE W. KELLY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, November 4, 1999

Mrs. KELLY. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to introduce the Women's Health and Cancer Rights Conforming Amendments of 1999. This bill is a technical correction to legislation adopted by Congress last year that ensures reconstructive surgery coverage for all stages of reconstruction, including symmetrical reconstruction, for breast cancer patients.

In the last Congress I introduced H.R. 616, the Women's Health and Cancer Rights Act of 1998. A specific provision of this bill that requires coverage for reconstructive procedures after breast cancer surgery was passed into law in Title IX of the Omnibus Budget Bill. While passage of last year's legislation was a wonderful step forward, a loophole has been identified which seriously weakens the intent of this legislation. The bill I am proposing would correct this flaw by conforming the Internal Revenue Code of 1986 to the requirements consistent with the Women's Health and Cancer Rights Act. This change would provide a civil monetary penalty against those health plans who fail to provide coverage for breast reconstruction following mastectomy or other breast cancer surgery.

There is indeed precedence for such a technical correction. Similar corrections were made to the Internal Revenue Code as part of the Taxpayer's Relief Act of 1997 to ensure compliance to the Mental Health Parity Act of 1996 and the Newborns' and Mothers' Health Protection Act of 1996. The correction I am seeking today is like these and would ensure compliance to the Women's Health and Cancer Rights Act of 1998.

Studies have documented that the fear of losing a breast is a leading reason why women do not participate in early breast cancer detection programs. Now that coverage is guaranteed for reconstructive surgery following breast cancer surgery, it is time to put the teeth in that language and hold health plans accountable for providing that coverage. As we continue this month of Breast Cancer Awareness, let us make this important correction to ensure the best possible support for breast cancer victims.

CONCERN WITH THE NEXT ROUND OF THE WTO AND TRADE LIBERALIZATION

HON. ENI F.H. FALEOMAVAEGA

OF AMERICAN SAMOA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, November 4, 1999

Mr. FALEOMAVAEGA. Mr. Speaker, the prospect of a ''Millennium Round'' of trade liberalization is inspiring heated debate both within the United States and the international community. While further liberalization could bring new opportunities for growth, there is much evidence that the costs of free trade have thus far outweighed the benefits for the majority of the world's people.

Mr. Speaker, if the United States is to maintain its commitment to strengthening democracy domestically and abroad, and to improving the quality of life for all its citizens, it is imperative that a thorough review of WTO policies and procedures be undertaken. Too many questions remain about the effects of trade liberalization—as illustrated by our Nation's mixed experience with NAFTA—and the United States should not rush blindly into a new round of WTO negotiations.

On this timely subject, Mr. Speaker, I recommend to our colleagues and the Nation an excellent article authored by Nora Connor, a Research Associate with the highly-regarded Council on Hemispheric Affairs (COHA), which is based in Washington.

WTO FACES INTERNAL DISCORD, PUBLIC OPPOSITION

With the World Trade Organizations ministerial meetings just days away, trade officials are still arguing over the basic agenda for the Seattle event. An October meeting in Lausanne clarified differences among participants, but saw little progress toward resolving them. Though certain items were to be given priority for a possible ''Millennium Round'' of trade talks, consensus has proven elusive. WTO member countries remain divided on issues such as the impact of the organization on environmental and labor issues, as well as the prioritization of specific agenda items.

In addition, WTO representatives will be facing raucous public opposition to a new round of trade talks. Numerous national and international groups have denounced the effects of previous free trade measures. These groups have planned large-scale protests to coincide with the ministerial, acting on behalf of labor rights, the environment, sustainable development, consumer rights, women's and children's issues, and the strengthening of democracy.

Trade experts in many nations insist that a broad agenda addressing the liberalization of previously untreated sectors (including services and agriculture) is the only way to ensure that the new round can move forward. Proponents of a broad agenda assert that any delay in trade liberalization would result in missed opportunities for huge gains in global trade and income, and could open the way for protectionist ''backsliding.'' Advocates of further liberalization also insist that the process must move forward if developing countries are to benefit from increased market access, greater consumer choice and increased opportunity to attract foreign investment.

Many anti-WTO protesters preparing to clog the streets of downtown Seattle say they categorically oppose any new round of trade talks. A petition outlining objections to a new round and calling for an exhaustive review of existing WTO agreements has been signed by over seven hundred groups worldwide. The signatories claim that trade liberalization has done little to benefit the world's poor. They also view the WTO as a threat to democracy, insisting that WTO policies have undermined elected governments' ability to prioritize national development, public health and safety issues, as well as interfered with consumer rights. These concerns are attracting widening publicity, and though they have been dismissed as instances of ''anxiety'' by U.S. Trade representative Charlene Barshefsky, and as ''attacks by extremists dedicated to spreading anarchy and defeating capitalism,'' by Financial Times contributor Guy de Jonquieres, popular opposition to the WTO could prove a significant barrier to further liberalization, particularly as the U.S. presidential race intensifies.

Despite their opponents' accusations to the contrary, free trade advocates insist that they too have the best interests of the world's population at heart. WTO director-general Mike Moore has summed up the position of free trade supporters in saying that ''the WTO is about raising living standards . . . if living standards rise, environmental standards rise, families are better off and children normally have a better education.'' Moore's position is a prime example of the ''rising tide lifts all boats'' line: what is good for the economy is good for people. Macroeconomic indicators both support and contradict this thesis, depending on one's point of view. In many developing areas, including Latin America, foreign investment is up, and inflation is down. The Financial Times reported last month that global income has grown dramatically as a result of trade liberalization. The rising-tide rationale is also being applied to the next round of negotiations, with experts insisting that the poorest countries also will benefit from the removal of agricultural trade barriers. Yet others suggest that conditions are worsening in the majority of developing regions. In Latin America overall economic growth has been ragged with less than 3% annually, according to the United Nations Commission on Trade and Development (UNCTAD), with some countries showing negative growth, job creation has slowed, and unemployment has remained fairly stable. Perhaps most telling, gaps in income distribution have sharply widened, suggesting that the free-market system contains inherent structural inequalities preventing some ''boats'' from rising despite general increases in trade, investment, and economic growth.

In addition, WTO policies continue to force developing countries to compete largely on the basis of their only truly competitive advantage: cheap labor. This presents a problem, as it has historically, in that labor is performed by workers who are also humans with a need to consume. Countries that must lower labor costs as a means to greater efficiency and greater competitiveness must essentially manipulate their populations in the service of ''the market.'' UNCTAD reports that Latin American workers experienced declines in real wages of 20–30% since the Uruguay Round was implemented beginning in 1990. It seems clear that all workers have not benefited from new trade patterns. Perversely, however, shrinking wages can contribute to the appearance of economic growth in the form of increased ''efficiency.'' Similarly, the rapid increase of temporary and ill-paid service jobs in countries like the U.S. is hailed as improved flexibility in the labor market—even though it may undermine job security for countless workers, and even though significant decreases in wages can adversely affect consumption.

Traditionally, the WTO has argued that labor and environmental matters—as well as the burden of ensuring equitable distribution of resources and profits—are best left to natural forces in member states, as they are not, classically speaking, trade-related. Yet the trade organization consistently has undermined member nations' attempts to regulate labor and environmental protection, with its dispute panel by categorizing many reforms as ''non-tariff barriers to trade,'' which may invite retaliatory sanctions. Issues that might be most effectively pursued by means of international cooperation, are instead reduced to bargaining chips. Developing countries, for example, suffer from environmental degradation just as developed countries do—sometimes even disproportionately, due to, for example, having to allow toxic materials to be dumped or incinerated in third-world countries, out of financial desperation. Yet efforts to enact environmental protection measures are often misguidedly opposed by poorer nations which cannot afford to implement similar measures, or lack the infrastructure to do so. Poorer countries perhaps naively believe that developed countries invoke stricter environmental measures as a ploy to protect their own domestic industries against overseas low cost competition. Labor issues have met a similar fate under free trade, with workers in neighboring countries often pitted against one another, rather than pooling their leverage in order to raise standards across the board.

Supporters of free trade explain the suffering connected with trade liberalization by insisting that such sectors are experiencing the temporary hardships tied to a certain stage in a process of industrialization or development. Once these nations modernize their industries and stabilize their markets in order to become more competitive, the script reads, living standards will improve. But this attitude belies the supposed concern with the plight of the world's most poverty-stricken, implying that those who are suffering in the ''early stages'' of a country's development will just have to take one for the team. If the poor must wait for the day when free trade will deliver on all of its promises and bring about real improvements in poverty levels and standards of living, as its proponents claim it can do, it seems reasonable to ask that the WTO pause to assess the impact of its policies on those whose destinies are far from assured.

THE REV. RONALD J. FOWLER

HON. TOM SAWYER

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, November 4, 1999

Mr. SAWYER. Mr. Speaker, for over 30 years, The Rev. Ronald J. Fowler has served with distinction as the Senior Pastor of the Arlington Church of God in my hometown of Akron, OH. When he assumed that position in January 1969, Ron Fowler knew that he had a difficult act to follow—the 23-year tenure of his father, The Rev. Robert L. Fowler.

Ron Fowler has done his father, his congregation, and our community proud.

Under his leadership, the Arlington Church of God has grown in membership and ministries. This growth has twice necessitated the building of new worship and educational facilities.

But Ron Fowler does more than attend to his congregation and preach the Gospel. Both in his public and private roles, he lives the Gospel, committing himself to meet the ever-growing needs of his congregation and our community.

His dedication and devotion to serving the needs of the community led him to spearhead the establishment of the Independent Living Facilities for Seniors, now known as A.H.O.P.E.S.

His commitment to education resulted in the creation of both the Irma Jones Preschool and Infant Center, and the Arlington Christian Academy. That same commitment was evident as Ron Fowler served on the Akron Board of Education, exercising community-wide education leadership, from 1988 to 1995, including two years as Board President.

But most notably, Ron has been a vocal and forceful advocate and champion of racial reconciliation throughout the community and the nation. For more than 10 years, his mostly African-American church has worked hand-in-hand with The Chapel, a predominantly white church, in the Allies race relations program. That powerful personal resolve was evident for all the Nation to see two years ago when President Clinton held his first Town Hall Meeting on Race in Akron.

In one of his sermons, Ron Fowler spoke of an ''unquenchable fire'' that shapes lives. ''Passion,'' he said, ''is not something we are born with. It is something acquired. Whatever the route by which we acquire it, the fire that burns daily within our bosom reveals much about our character and understanding of what our mission in life is.''

There is no question that Ron Fowler has that fire.

He is the living embodiment of his own challenge to ''Press on'' and ''Take hold of the faith that gives all of us tomorrow.''

Mr. Speaker, on behalf of our community, let me offer congratulations to Ron and Joyce Fowler and their family on 30 years of service through the Arlington Church of God. They have touched and enriched countless lives in their congregation and throughout our community. We are deeply grateful for their service and for their indelible example to the Nation.

HONORING UAW LOCAL 599 REUTHER AWARD RECIPIENTS

HON. DALE E. KILDEE

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, November 4, 1999

Mr. KILDEE. Mr. Speaker, it is my great pleasure to pay tribute to 23 members of UAW Local 599, who will be recipients of the Walter P. Reuther Distinguished Service Award. On Saturday, November 6, 1999, these individuals will be honored at the 19th Annual Walter and May Reuther Twenty Year Award Banquet.

Local 599 has always had a special place in my heart because my father was one of its original members. Over the years, Local 599 has developed a strong and proud tradition of supporting the rights of working people in our community, and improving the quality of life for its membership. This year marked the 60th anniversary of the local's charter, and its commitment to working for decent wages, education and training, and civil and human rights.

Mr. Speaker, it is indeed an honor to recognize these special individuals who, have diligently served their union and community. During this time, each one of these UAW members have held various elected positions in the union. And there is no question they have represented their brothers and sisters well.

It is very fitting that these 23 people be recipients of the Walter P. Reuther Distinguished Service Award. Walter Reuther was a man who believed in helping working people, and he believed in human dignity and social justice for all Americans. The recipients of this award have committed themselves to the ideals and principles of Walter Reuther. They are outstanding men and women who come from every part of our community, and they share the common bond of unwavering commitment and service.

Mr. Speaker, I would ask my colleagues in the House of Representatives to join me in honoring Robert Aidif, David Aiken, Dennis Carl, Russell W. Cook, Harvey DeGroot, Patrick Dolan, Larry Farlin, Maurice Felling, Ted Henderson, James Yaklin, Ken Mead, Don Wilson, Frank Molina, Shirley Prater, Gene Ridley, John D. Rogers, Dale Scanlon, G. Jean Garza-Smith, Nick Vuckovich, Jerry J. Ward, Greg Wheeler, Tom Worden, and Dale Bingley. I want to congratulate these fine people for all of the work they have done to make our community a better place to live.

TRIBUTE TO AMBASSADOR VICTOR MARRERO

HON. JOSÉ E. SERRANO

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, November 4, 1999

Mr. SERRANO. Mr. Speaker, I rise to pay tribute to Ambassador Victor Marrero, an outstanding individual who on October 1 was unanimously confirmed by the Senate to fill a vacancy on the federal bench in New York's Southern District.

Ambassador Marrero was born in Puerto Rico and moved to New York City with his parents when he was 10. He graduated from New York University (B.A. cum laude, with Honors in History, Phi Beta Kappa). He received his law degree from the Yale Law School, where he was elected Editor of the Yale Law Journal. He was a Fulbright Scholar at the University of Sheffield (U.K.) School of Law and has taught as a Visiting Lecturer in Law at Yale and Columbia Law Schools.

Mr. Speaker, before his confirmation to the bench, Ambassador Marrero served as the Permanent Representative of the United States to the Organization of American States. His achievements during his tenure at the OAS are impressive. Among his proposals that have been adopted are the restructuring of the General Assembly in order to streamline the number of days and make it more efficient and effective, reform to eliminate duplication and waste through a new Inter-American Agency for Cooperation and Development, and creation of the Center for the Study of Justice in the Americas. Through Attorney General Janet Reno he has pledged $1,000,000 for the Center, to promote research on legal matters, train personnel, exchange information, and provide technical support on the reform processes of judicial systems in the Americas.

Mr. Speaker, before this posting, Ambassador Marrero served since 1993 as the United States Representative on the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations. He brought to his diplomatic posts extensive experience in private law practice and business in New York as well as public service in federal, state and city government.

Prior to his service at the United Nations, Ambassador Marrero practiced law in New York City. As a partner in the Manhattan law firm of Brown and Wood, he specialized in real estate, land use, development and environmental law.

During the Carter Administration, Ambassador Marrero was Under Secretary of the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development. Previously he had been Commissioner of the New York State Division of Housing and Community Renewal and the Vice Chairman of the New York State Housing Finance Agency. Before joining state government, he served as Chairman of the City Planning Commission of New York City.

Mr. Speaker, Ambassador Marrero has served as Director or Trustee for numerous civic education, charitable and professional organizations, as well as the Mayor of New York's Management Advisory Committee and Commission on the homeless, and the Yale University Urban Advisory Committee.

Ambassador Marrero is married to Veronica M. White. They have two children, Andrew and Robert.

Mr. Speaker, I ask my colleagues to join me in congratulating Ambassador Victor Marrero for his accomplishments as the Permanent Representative of the United States to the Organization of American States and in wishing him success as a Federal Judge in Manhattan.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA COLLEGE ACCESS ACT

SPEECH OF

HON. ROBERT L. EHRLICH, JR.

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, November 1, 1999

Mr. EHRLICH. Mr. Speaker, I strongly support H.R. 974, the District of Columbia College Access Act. It is legislation long overdue and deserves an immediate Presidential signature. This legislation expands the educational choices and opportunities of eligible District of Columbia students by establishing a program that permits these graduates to pay in-state tuition rates upon admission to state colleges in Maryland or Virginia. Moreover, this will benefit the already first-rate educational opportunities in these states by increasing the number and quality of candidates for admission.

Unlike the 50 states, the university system in the District of Columbia is significantly limited. The University of the District of Columbia is the city's only public university. Thus, if high school graduates from the District's schools want to attend an institution of higher learning and pay-in-state tuition they have no choice except the District's university. This is unacceptable.

H.R. 974 levels the playing field. It provides eligible high school graduates from the District's schools a network of state-supported colleges to attend. Specifically, this legislation establishes a program to permit D.C. residents who are recent high school graduates the ability to pay in-state tuition rates upon admission to state colleges in Maryland or Virginia. Under this proposal, the federal government will pay the difference between the two rates, creating no additional cost to state universities. Public university grants may not exceed $10,000 in any award year, with a total cap of $50,000 per individual.

Additionally, this legislation provides tuition assistance grants of $2,500 for students attending private colleges in the District or the adjoining Maryland and Virginia suburbs, including historically black colleges and universities as another educational option for the District's students.

Access to quality education in the United States is essential. This bill goes a long way to ensure that the students of the District of Columbia are afforded a variety of educational opportunities at a reasonable cost. It will encourage the young people of the District of Columbia to complete high school and seek further education. This will enable them to acquire better jobs in the future, earn good salaries, and improve the quality of life in the entire Washington, D.C. metropolitan region.

COUNCIL OF KHALISTAN LETTER IN NEW YORK POST ALLEGES RELIGIOUS PERSECUTION IN INDIA

HON. JOHN T. DOOLITTLE

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, November 4, 1999

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to call the attention of my colleagues to a letter that appeared on Wednesday, November 3, 1999, in the New York Post by Dr. Gurmit Singh Aulakh, President of the Council of Khalistan. It reveals the religious persecution in India.

Christians have been actively persecuted in India in recent months, a pattern carried out on Sikhs, Muslims, and others.

I urge all my colleagues to read the attached letter, which I am placing in the RECORD.

[From the New York Post, Nov. 3, 1999]

RELIGIOUS PERSECUTION IN INDIA

Thank you, Rod Dreher, for an excellent article (''Pope's passage to India may be most perilous yet,'' Oct. 28) exposing the ''Hindu brownshirts'' who run India.

The religious persecution of Christians has reached unparalled proportions, as Dreher aptly points out. But it is not just Christians who have suffered severe religious persecution. India has killed over 200,000 Christians, over 250,000 Sikhs, more than 65,000 Muslims and tens of thousands of Assamese, Manipuris, Tamils, Dalits and others since its independence. Thousands of minorities, especially Sikhs, remain in Indian jails as political prisoners without charge or trial.

The Western world must not accept this pattern of religious tyranny.

DR. GURMIT SINGH AULAKH,
Council of Khalistan,
Washington D.C. (via e-mail).

REPUBLICANS ARE WINNING THE BUDGET FIGHT

HON. ERNEST J. ISTOOK, JR.

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, November 4, 1999

Mr. ISTOOK. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to commend the Republicans in the House and the Senate on our pledge not to spend Social Security. To that end, I recommend the reading of the following article by Tod Lindberg, which appeared in the November 8th issue of The Weekly Standard.

HOUSE REPUBLICANS ARE WINNING ONE

THE BUDGET BATTLE OF 1999, HARD TO BELIEVE BUT TRUE, HAS FEATURED GOP CUNNING

(By Tod Lindberg)

Republicans both inside and outside Congress have been pleasantly surprised by how well they are doing politically in this year's budget fight with President Clinton. Ever since Clinton squashed the Republican Congress over the government shutdown in 1995–96, the autumnal rites of appropriation have been a time of dread for the GOP, an exercise in wondering who among them will be a human sacrifice come the next election as a result of drawing the wrath of the Democratic administration.

This time, simply put, they are not getting killed. In fact, thanks to their tireless reiteration of their unifying theme—namely, that they are going to protect every last dime of Social Security from marauding Democrats—and thanks to the money the GOP is spending on advertising in select congressional districts repeating the point, poll numbers show the Republican message taking hold. It looks like Republicans have at last found an incantation with the same black magic power as the Democrats' ''Medicare, Medicaid, education, and the environment.''

Now, there are those who might say that the real secret of the GOP's success, such as it is, has been timely surrender, appeasement, and subterfuge: that Republicans have whole-heartedly agreed to substantial increases in government spending. The spending caps theoretically imposed by the balanced budget agreement have in effect been blown to smithereens, and the appropriations bills themselves are, in the aggregate, full of budgetary gimmickry and self-aggrandizing assumptioneering. This, snort some, is what a Republican Congress does? Crank up spending and cook the books to hide it?

Well, up to a point. Those who see a smaller, more limited federal government as the sole test of conservative success will rightly be disappointed. At the end of the appropriations process—which is to say, before final negotiations with the White House—domestic discretionary outlays were scheduled to grow by 6 percent. The increase in outlays will surely outpace the growth of the economy in 2000. In absolute and relative terms, government is not shrinking but growing.

But this raises the question: By how much? And compared with what? In judging the Republican performance, it's only fair to take account of political reality—in particular, the terra incognita of budgeting in an era of surplus.

A better term for Bill Clinton's ''Third Way'' governing philosophy might be ''balanced-budget liberalism.'' For years, Republicans ran against the federal budget deficit, while Democrats only paid lip service to the concept (though they were always prepared to raise taxes in the name of deficit reduction). With their new majority after the 1994 elections, Republicans felt obliged to attack the deficit head-on. Politically, they ran into the Clintonian buzzsaw. But in the end, thanks in no small measure to a surging economy, Clinton was happy to grant Republicans what they had always claimed was their fondest wish: a balanced federal budget.

One should, of course, be careful what one wishes for, lest one get it. Before Republicans saw it, Clinton understood the political implications of a world of budget surpluses. If your main argument against federal spending is ''the deficit,'' then surpluses translate into more spending. The GOP leadership on Capitol Hill disagreed. Many of them still wanted to cut spending or at least restrain increases. But for the first time in their political lives, the budget deficit was no longer at hand as an easy argument against spending. And Clinton would not go along with a tax cut acceptable to Republicans, so no budget restraint would be imposed by depriving the government of tax revenue.

This is the box Republicans found themselves in at the beginning of the 1999 budget season, with the additional headache, after their 1998 election losses, of only a whisker-thin majority in the House. What's more, impeachment-related political tumult had claimed first the Gingrich speakership and then Bob Livingston's, resulting in the elevation of the amiable but untested Dennis Hastert of Illinois. This looked for all the world like an environment in which Clinton could fragment the House Republicans and dictate the spending levels he wanted, up to the limits of the budget surplus.

Indeed, this was the calculation the House leadership made at first. They were inclined to abandon the budget caps early and make an expensive peace with the White House, thereby avoiding the nightmare scenario of another government shutdown for which they would be blamed—and the end of their majority in 2000. But there was serious resistance in the ranks to the idea of popping the caps. So they hung on and looked for some other survival kit, and found an unlikely one.

They decided to make Social Security their friend. For years, the fact that government took in more in Social Security taxes than it paid in benefits, $99 billion in 1998, was irrelevant to the big picture on the deficit. In other words, government ''spent'' the Social Security ''surplus''—that is, the deficit for running the rest of the government, apart from Social Security, would have been higher by the amount of the Social Security surplus. No one seriously objected to this ''raid'' on the ''Social Security trust fund.'' These are arbitrary accounting distinctions.

Then, in a series of head-scratching staff meetings devoted to the question of how not to get killed, Republicans finally hit paydirt—a line they could articulate simply and clearly, with potential for public resonance, and around which they could keep their slender majority united, against all odds. It was ''Stop the Raid'' on Social Security. At a stroke, they were able to declare some $147 billion of the federal budget surplus for 2000 off limits to new spending. And they were able to hold that line.

In accounting reality, this Social Security surplus figure is not less arbitrary than the budget caps supposedly still in force. But in the real world of politics, the fact is that budget caps were too abstract to hold Republicans together. Social Security is real. Clinton's rhetorical case against a tax cut hinged on protecting Social Security, for example.

Without necessarily setting out to do so, the GOP leadership essentially created a very useful artificial deficit, the size of the Social Security surplus. This ''deficit'' now serves as a restraint on federal spending—and will continue to do so. The Social Security surplus is estimated at about $155 billion in fiscal 2001 and $164 billion the year after. If Republicans win this point, it's likely to work for them in future budget rounds.

The story of the fiscal 2000 budget, then, is not the story of gimmicks and gewgaws. That's the story of the budget every year. The story is how a perilously thin and nervous GOP majority under an untested leader managed to change the subject in such a way as to forestall scores of billions in additional government spending at a time when the government had the money. Dennis Hastert turns out to be the most underestimated politician in Washington since Bill Clinton in January 1995.

HONORING JUNE HOROVITZ

HON. ROBIN HAYES

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, November 4, 1999

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to honor a legislative hawk from North Carolina who is going to be moving out of our state in just a few days. June Horovitz from Raleigh, has worked hard for the people of North Carolina. Although she has never been elected and she has never been paid a lobbying fee, she has worked for over 17 years to make North Carolina a better place.

I first met June in 1992 as a state legislator in North Carolina's General Assembly. June does not drive, so she would ride the bus or catch a ride with a friend down to the legislature building and attend committee meetings and visit with members. We became fast friends due to her hard work to eliminate the state sales tax on food. June's cause prevailed. Last year, the General Assembly repealed the final two cents of the state's portion of the food tax.

Since moving on, June has kept me informed of the issues in the North Carolina General Assembly. June is moving to Boca Raton, Florida on Thursday, November 18 to be closer to her brother and his family. I expect she will continue to fight high taxes and wasteful government in her new state of residence. I thank her for all her support and wish her all the best.

THE NORTH KOREA ADVISORY GROUP

HON. BENJAMIN A. GILMAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, November 4, 1999

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, in August of this year, Speaker J. DENNIS HASTERT asked me to chair a group of nine members, including Representatives FLOYD SPENCE, PORTER GOSS, CHRIS COX, TILLIE FOWLER, SONNY CALLAHAN, DOUG BEREUTER, CURT WELDON, and JOE KNOLLENBERG to examine the threat that North Korea poses to the United States. We issued our report today. This is the summary of that report:

I. Do the North Korean weapons of mass destruction (WMD) programs pose a greater threat to U.S. security than five years ago?

North Korea's WMD programs pose a major threat to the United States and its allies. This threat has advanced considerably over the past five years, particularly with the enhancement of North Korea's missile capabilities. There is significant evidence that undeclared nuclear weapons development activity continues, including efforts to acquire uranium enrichment technologies and recent nuclear-related high explosive tests. This means that the United States cannot discount the possibility that North Korea could produce additional nuclear weapons outside of the constraints imposed by the 1994 Agreed Framework.

In the last five years, North Korea's missile capabilities have improved dramatically. North Korea has produced, deployed and exported missiles to Iran and Pakistan, launched a three-stage missile (Taepo Dong 1), and continues to develop a larger and more powerful missile (Taepo Dong 2). Unlike five years ago, North Korea can now strike the United States with a missile that could deliver high explosive, chemical, biological, or possibly nuclear weapons. Currently, the United States is unable to defend against this threat.

The progress that North Korea has made over the past five years in improving its missile capabilities, its record as a major proliferator of ballistic missiles and missile technology, combined with its development activities on nuclear, biological and chemical weapons, ranks North Korea with Russia and China as one of the greatest missile proliferation threats in the world.

II. Do North Korean conventional forces pose a greater threat to peace on the Korean peninsula than five years ago?

North Korea is less capable of successfully invading and occupying South Korea today than it was five years ago, due to issues of readiness, sustainability, and modernization. It has, however, built an advantage in long-range artillery, short-range ballistic missiles, and special operations forces. This development, along with its chemical and biological weapons capability and forward-deployed forces, gives North Korea the ability to inflict significant casualties on U.S. and South Korean forces and civilians in the earliest stages of any conflict.

III. Does North Korea pose a greater threat to international stability than five years ago?

The Democratic People's Republic of Korea (DPRK) is a greater threat to international stability primarily in Asia and secondarily in the Middle East. North Korea is arguably the largest proliferator of missiles and enabling technology in the world, with its primary markets being South Asia and the Middle East. Its proliferation activities pose an increasing threat to American and allied interests globally. Pyongyang continues to harbor terrorists, produce and traffic in narcotics, counterfeit U.S. currency, and infiltrate agents into South Korea and Japan.

IV. Does U.S. assistance sustain the North Korean government?

The United States has replaced the Soviet Union as a primary benefactor of North Korea. The United States now feeds more than one-third of all North Koreans, and the U.S.-supported KEDO program supplies almost half of its HFO needs. This aid frees other resources for North Korea to divert to its WMD and conventional military programs.

U.S. aid to North Korea has grown from zero to more than $270 million annually, totaling $645 million over the last five years. Based on current trends, that total will likely exceed $1 billion next year. During that same time, North Korea developed missiles capable of striking the United States and became a major drug trafficking and currency counterfeiting nation.

Despite assurances from the administration, U.S. food and fuel assistance is not adequately monitored. At least $11 million in HFO assistance has been diverted. In contravention of stated U.S. policy, food has been distributed in places where monitors are denied access. One U.S. aid worker in North Korea recently called the monitoring are denied access. One U.S. aid worker in North Korea recently called the monitoring system a ''scam.'' More than 90% of food aid distribution sites in North Korea have never been visited by a food aid monitor. The North Koreans have never divulged a complete list of where aid is distributed.

North Korea has the longest sustained U.N. food emergency program in history. There are no significant efforts to support or compel agricultural and economic reforms needed for North Korea to feed itself. North Korea will likely continue to refuse to reform, instead relying on brinkmanship to exact further aid from the United States and other members of the international community.

V. Do the policies of the North Korean government undermine the political and/or economic rights of its people more so than five years ago?

The condition of the North Korean people, both physically and politically, is worse than at any time in the history of their government. U.N. nutritional studies and other research have shown that at least one million North Koreans have starved to death since 1994, while many others face starvation. North Korea's medical system has collapsed with its economy, transforming common diseases into death sentences for many. North Korean hospitals largely function as hospices.

North Korea has the worst human rights record of any government in the world. The DPRK formally categorizes its citizens into 51 classes. Seven million citizens, one-third of the population, are regarded as members of the ''hostile'' class. North Korea has established prisons for hungry children, and is the only place on earth where a hungry child wandering away from home is imprisoned. North Korea is also unique in being the only country that has attempted to withdraw from a key human rights treaty.

The regime of Kim Jong Il depends on maintaining high levels of fear to oppress its people. The perpetual state of crisis that the regime generates with the international community ensures internal discipline and demands absolute support for the regime. This policy requires the regime to keep the North Korean people isolated and ill-informed on developments in the outside world.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker, I look forward to working with my colleagues on the International Relations Committee as well as the members of the Intelligence and Armed Services Committees as we take follow-up actions on this important issue.

COUNCIL ON HEMISPHERIC AFFAIRS

HON. EDOLPHUS TOWNS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, November 4, 1999

Mr. TOWNS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to submit for the RECORD the attached articles, ''One Commission To Be Proud of'' and ''The Effect of the U.S. Embargo on Cuban Health Care in Cuba'', in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. Speaker, ever since its creation in the wake of the 1959 Cuban Revolution, the Inter-American System for the Protection of Human Rights has played an extraordinary role in promoting justice on the continent. The Commission and the Court have consistently furthered this country's authentic national interests by helping oppressed populations defend themselves against dictatorships and by working for the establishment of democratic norms.

However, this institution finds itself at a critical juncture and needs political support. Human rights crimes are sill being perpetrated throughout the hemisphere, yet the chronic under-funding of these OAS bodies threatens their effectiveness. Furthermore, Peru's recent withdrawal from the jurisdiction of the Court deserves maximum condemnation and should not be allowed to set a precedent for those governments hoping to escape accountability. The United States should lead by example and finally ratify the Inter-American Convention on Human Rights and accept the jurisdiction of the Court.

The following research memorandum was authored by Eric Angles, a Research Fellow with the Washington-based Council on Hemispheric Affairs (COHA). This timely and trenchant article gives credit to the Inter-American System for its accomplishments, and emphasizes how pivotal U.S. backing is to its success.

ONE COMMISSION TO BE PROUD OF

(By Eric Angles, Research Fellow, council on Hemispheric Affairs)

Pinochet and Milosevic indicted for their crimes; a ''just war'' waged in the Balkans at heavy political, diplomatic and military risk; the human rights debate has clearly shifted gears. Gone is the era when egregious patterns of abuses remained concealed behind sacrosanct national borders, or neatly rhetoricized away by Cold War realpolitik. At last public indignation is being heeded. This is a very positive sign, with much credit being owed to intrepid journalists and relentless human rights promoters, those good men and women in gray.

But plaudits—a great deal of them—must also go to a more discrete actor, the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights. Ironically, since its founding in 1959 by the Organization of American States, some of its backers have belonged among the world's most flagrant offenders; and the Commission has certainly had to struggle for a measure of independence. Early on, periodic in loco visits to human rights Gethsemane and hard-hitting country reports proved effective in at least publicizing the cruelties of barbarous regimes. Scores of lives were doubtlessly saved during the junta years owing to the boldness of these investigative missions. But new and impressive accomplishments in the 1990s have since firmly entrenched the crucial role of the Commission and its judicial arm, the Inter-American Court, in promoting justice throughout the Americas.

Most far-reaching is a mechanism whereby individuals deprived of their rights can lodge a petition. Public hearings are then held and embarrassing rulings often rendered. Over twelve thousand cases have been considered since 1965, primarily involving killings, torture and ''disappearances''. More complex issues are not increasingly addressed, such as the rights of women and indigenous populations. Not only have wrongs been condemned and at least partly redressed; Commission and Court decisions have set invaluable standards for use by other international human rights bodies under the United Nations, European and African systems.

Just as tellingly perhaps, recalcitrant states now defend themselves with unprecedented ferocity when chastised by a jurisdiction which, after all, they once opted into. In the early years, offenders largely ignored unfavorable findings. By contrast, a fulminating President Fujimori found it necessary to withdraw Peru from the Court's competence rather than face additional rulings against the country's summary military trials—one of whose victims was young U.S. national Lori Berenson, sentenced for life in 1996 without even a shred of due process. Fujimori's outrageous move will only serve to isolate Peru, and to little avail since Commission proceedings cannot be blocked short of renouncing OAS membership. Simply put, avoidance strategies are fast running out for renegade leaders.

The Inter-American system's effectiveness derives at least in part from heightened political support since the end of the Cold War. But if basic principles of justice are being enforced and not merely exalted, above all it is due to the efforts and persistence of the Commission. Ambiguously comprised of legal experts nominated by governments, it could easily have remained the typical OAS cipher. Yet skillful navigation by a deft leadership and expert staff has admirably defied the odds. ''Quasi-judicial'' prerogatives provide it with a uniquely effective blend of political initiative—most notably the power to throw the spotlight on a selected issue or country—and the authority to set legal precedent. At the same time, the Commission has displayed an even-handedness that has done wonders for its credibility: a case in point was the 1999 report on Columbia detailing wrongdoings both by government and guerrilla forces.

Commission and Court practice also has shown remarkable boldness and creativity. The landmark 1988 Velazquez Rodriguez judgment against Honduras laid out key legal definitions in such a way as to limit procedural escape routes for guilty parties. Other international norms like the humanitarian conventions of Geneva are also commonly invoked when necessary. In no small measure, this is contributing to the slow rise of universal accountability for governments who pull out the nails of their own citizens.

Curiously, these hard-won accomplishments have remained mostly uncelebrated, especially in the U.S., which does not recognize the Court and all but ignores adverse determinations by the Commission. Aren't we too quick to take for granted justice enforced on behalf of our countrymen, such as Matthew Blake, murdered by agents of the Guatemalan state in the early 1980s? There is no question that when provided U.S. backing will be pivotal if full-fledged judicial mechanisms are one day to emerge for the regional and global protection of human rights. Congress' antiquated aversion to international adjudication sits oddly indeed alongside the lofty foreign policy goals articulated by Capitol Hill leaders and Presidents alike.

Success is rarely self-perpetuating. At under three million dollars a year the Commission is absurdly under-funded in the light of its expanding mission. Worse still, a group of disgruntled OAS states very nearly managed to brush back much of its power two years ago, thwarted only by the timely mobilization of concerned private groups. With malefactor states and Fujimori-like leaders waiting to bushwhack it at every corner, public support remains crucial to the furtherance of the Commission's outstanding work into the next century.

Mr. Speaker, legislation such as the 1992 Cuban Democracy Act (CDA) and the 1996 Helms-Burton Act have tightened the U.S. embargo against Cuba to the point that has it negatively effected the health of Cuban civilians and has profoundly damaged the country's revolutionary health care system and medical research institutes. Current U.S. policy towards Cuba severely restricts the export of medicine, the medical supplies and technology to the island by demanding a political test which it is anticipated that Cuban authorities will continue to reject. The Warner-Dodd bill in the Senate and the Freedom to Market Act in the House would reevaluate the embargo and remove restrictions on the sale of grain, medicine and medical supplies to Cuba. These measures were initiated partially in response to numerous studies reporting that the health of Cuban citizens has deteriorated greatly, and hospitals are in dire need of supplies due to the embargo.

The following research memorandum was authorized by David Roberts, a Research Associate with the Washington-based Council on Hemispheric Affairs (COHA). It represents an elaborated version of an article recently published in COHA's biweekly publication, the Washington Report on the Hemisphere. This timely and pertinent article investigates the effect that U.S. policy has had on the Cuban health care system and the well-being of the Cuban populace.

THE EFFECT OF THE U.S. EMBARGO ON CUBAN HEALTH CARE

(By David Roberts, Research Associate, Council on Hemispheric Affairs)

Senators John Warner (R–VA) and Christopher Dodd (D–CT) have reintroduced a bill designed to remove restrictions on the sale of grain, medicine and medical supplies to Cuba. The U.S. embargo currently prohibits all trade with the island including restrictions on humanitarian aid such as medicine and food. Cuba is now the only nation worldwide denied access to medical supplies as part of a U.S. embargo. The Warner-Dodd bill and its sister measure in the House, the Freedom to Market Act (HR 212), were initiated this year in order to alleviate the suffering caused by the embargo against Cuban civilians that has been in place for nearly 40 years.

Since 1959, the U.S. government has unsuccessfully tried to unseat Castro by any means ranging from economic sanctions to assassination attempts. In recent years, Washington has increased pressure on Castro, enacting legislation such as the 1992 Cuban Democracy Act (CDA) and the 1996 Helms-Burton measure, whose net result has been to impede the exportation of medicines and medical technology to Cuba. These regulations have discouraged the transfer of health care resources through purposely restrictive licensing procedures and denying U.S. visas to, and even suing, executives of foreign companies found to be trading with the island. The collapse of the Soviet Union and the Eastern bloc, Cuba's principal benefactors, exacerbated the damaging effects of U.S. sanctions. As a result, health conditions in Cuba have deteriorated significantly.

Prior to the Warner-Dodd bill, the Dodd-Torres legislation in 1998 was introduced which was aimed at removing the provision of food and medicine from the U.S. sanctions list. The act lost its viability when Senate amendments emasculated the measure, turning the proposed bill into a vehicle for that would make matters worse for Cuba. Hostile riders to the bill permitted sanctions against ''terrorist'' nations that deny access to food, medicine or medical care as a means of coercion or punishment of a segment of the local populace, effectively invalidating the intentions of the bill's sponsors. Although Cuba has faced international pressure over its flagging human rights record, Havana officials maintain in return that the U.S. embargo has inflicted far more grievous rights violations against Cubans. Critics of the embargo condemn its hypocritical nature because it denies Cuba access to food and medicine as a form of coercion, while the U.S. simultaneously chastises Havana for not providing the population with these essential products. Although the Clinton administration recently ended similar policies against Iran, Libya and Sudan, arguing that ''food should not be used as a foreign policy tool,'' the administration maintains a much more severe embargo including both food and medical supplies against Cuba.

A HISTORY OF GUARANTEED HEALTH CARE

Obsessed with eliminating ''human, social and economic underdevelopment,'' Castro revolutionized the country's medical system in 1959, introducing comprehensive free health care for all Cubans. For several decades this system was considered a model for other Third World nations. The country's constitution guarantees citizens the right to free medical treatment and preventive care. The health delivery system focuses on women's health, providing programs for the early detection of breast and cervical cancer, prenatal care, and free child immunization. Previously, when medicines were available, state pharmacies filled prescriptions for free as well as formulated vaccines which were supplied by the bustling domestic drug manufacturing industry.

Cuba's progressive health care policy propelled the country's successful and internationally acclaimed biotechnology and pharmacology export industries. The island's 11 ''world class'' research institutions made impressive advances, some of which were greatly respected by the international medical community. These institutes have been credited with developing innovative medical breakthroughs including vaccines for hepatitis–B and meningitis–B. In fact, Cuba is the sole producer of a vaccine for meningitis–B that has been proven to reduce the incidence of the disease by 93%. The institute also developed a surgical cure for retinitis pigmentosa, a genetic disorder that may lead to blindness or tunnel vision.

LONG-TERM EFFECTS ON THE EMBARGO

While Cuban authorities maintain their resolve to provide the populace with greatly needed medical care, highly qualified doctors still face long lines of patients with only antiquated technology to treat them. Even the medicines produced by the pharmacology industry are difficult to obtain because imports of their components have been restricted by the blockade. Despite the previous successes posted by the pharmacology industry, island drug store shelves are now empty. Although recent changes have allowed for some medical sales to Cuba, each transaction must receive prior approval from the U.S. Treasury Department in order to insure that the sale will not benefit the Cuban government and that such supplies will only be handled by independent and non-governmental agencies. Currently, only one U.S. company has sought license to sell medical goods to Cuba. A study by the American Association for World Health found that Cuban hospitals are in dire need of basic medical supplies as a result of U.S. policies. This is partially due to the fact that the government-run health care system serves the impoverished sector of the population, which cannot otherwise purchase medicine, while other hospitals serving wealthier Cubans and foreigners reap the benefits of this minor relaxation of the embargo. The only relief for the average Cuban citizen comes on the daily charter flight from Miami that brings donations from individuals and aid from the few Catholic humanitarian agencies authorized to operate on the island.

The U.S. embargo and the tempo with which it is being administered is indisputably hurting the majority of Cubans. Critics of the status quo maintain that lifting sanctions and following a policy of constructive engagement would be of great benefit to the general population. Several U.S. legislators recently have traveled to Cuba, indicating a need for more non-political relations with the island. ''Cuban can benefit from the research of the National Institutes of Health and we can benefit from the research (the Cubans) are doing on meningitis-B,'' said Sen. Arlene Specter (R–PA) following a recent visit to the island.

Although the Warner-Dodd bill and HR 212 are meant to transcend party lines, it will be difficult to advance such creative thinking in either the House or the Senate due to the opposition of such powerful and unregenerate Cuba-bashers as Senate Foreign Relations Chairman, Jesse Helms (R–N.C.) and Florida's Cuban-American lobby.

IN HONOR OF THE BAYONNE ECONOMIC OPPORTUNITY FOUNDATION ON 34 YEARS OF DEDICATION TO THE CITY OF BAYONNE AND TO THIS YEAR'S HONOREES, MR. AL SAMBADE AND MR. THOMAS CUSEGLIO

HON. ROBERT MENENDEZ

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, November 4, 1999

Mr. MENENDEZ. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to recognize the Bayonne Economic Opportunity Foundation for its continued service to the City of Bayonne, New Jersey, and this year's honorees, Mr. Al Sambade and Mr. Thomas Cuseglio.

The Bayonne Economic Opportunity Foundation, a social service agency in its 34th year, has remained a vibrant and reliable force in the community. Following the slogan, ''People Helping People,'' the foundation has remained dedicated to serving the people of the community through various outreach programs, including Head Start and Meats on Wheels. And this year's honorees truly embody the goals of this organization.

Serving as Assistant Municipal Engineer from 1981 through 1987, Mr. Sambade has worked diligently for the City of Bayonne throughout his career. From funding procurement to construction supervision of various public buildings, drainage systems, and vital water distribution systems, Mr. Sambade's contributions can be seen throughout the city.

Mr. Sambade, a registered architect, licensed engineer, and professional planner in the State of New Jersey, founded the DAL Design Group in 1987. As the organization's President, he supervised millions of dollars worth of diversified housing and commercial and industrial development projects in the State.

A graduate of the Roberson School in Bayonne, Mr. Sambade is also very active in charitable organizations, such as the Boy Scouts, Windmill Alliance, and the Hudson County ARC.

Mr. Cuseglio has been both an active and visible force in the Bayonne community for more than three decades. From 1979 through 1983, Mr. Cuseglio served as City of Bayonne Building Inspector. By 1983, because of his expertise and unmatched commitment to the City, Mr. Cuseglio was serving as City Construction Official, Building Sub Code Official, Zoning Officer, and Relocation Officer.

After retiring from the City in 1992, Mr. Cuseglio continued his commitment to his life work by accepting a part-time position with the City of Keansburg as a Field Inspector to Code and Specification for its revitalization programs. And just four years later, in 1996 returned to Bayonne as ''Clerk of the Works.'' In this capacity, Mr. Cuseglio was responsible for inspecting all construction sites.

Mr. Cuseglio remains active in community and charitable organizations. Presently, he serves on the Board of Trustees of the Bayonne Economic Opportunity Foundation.

These two men exemplify leadership and dedication to the City of Bayonne and to the Bayonne Economic Opportunity Foundation. For these tremendous contributions to New Jersey and their incredible example as public servants, I am very happy to congratulate Mr. Sambade and Mr. Cuseglio for their achievements. I salute and congratulate both of them on their extraordinary accomplishments.

TRIBUTE TO JOHN MORAMARCO

HON. KEN CALVERT

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, November 4, 1999

Mr. CALVERT. Mr. Speaker, I take the floor today to recognize the outstanding career of John Moramarco, who is retiring as Senior Vice President and General Manager at Callaway Vineyard and Winery in Temecula, California—after 30 years with the winery.

John comes from a long history of vintners. In fact, he started his career at the family's Old Mission Winery in Los Angeles as a young boy, and continued the family tradition as an 11th generation viticulturalist.

Years in the family business allowed John to learn the basics of the business, and the finer points and finesse of making great wine.

It was his love of wine, and know how, that John applied to the Capistrano Winery and Vineyards in Fontana, California, which he and his brother, Mike, established. John became the vineyard's manager from 1945 to 1967, and put into place the lessons learned from his youth—grape growing, wine producing, marketing and sales techniques. He also continued to supervise the family's vines and those of several other wineries.

In 1969, Ely Callaway hired John Moramarco to plant and supervise his new vineyard in the small, rural Riverside County town of Temecula. In this position, John was instrumental in Callaway's vineyard and wine development.

Only recently have I had the privilege of working with John, and observing his talent, first hand. Wineries in Southern California are currently facing an unfortunate situation with a disease that kills grapevines and has no cure. But, John's life-time devotion to the industry has made the California Wine Industry better prepared than they may have been.

John's progressive work with professors from both the Universities of California at Davis and Riverside, gives the wine industry a relationship that they can now draw upon to solve this crisis. The industry is indebted to John's work with the universities and his willingness to devote vineyard blocks to the universities for their experiments. Those experiments have resulted in improved rootstocks, fertilizers, herbicides, mildew resistance, grafting and pruning, techniques now standard practice in California, and will give the industry the greatest chance of surviving their current crisis.

I know that I speak for everyone in the wine industry when I say, "John will be missed."

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

HON. JAMES H. MALONEY

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, November 4, 1999

Mr. MALONEY of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, I was unavoidably detained during rollcall vote No. 567. Had I been present I would have voted "no" on rollcall No. 567.

ARTICLE EXPOSES HINDU FUNDAMENTALISTS' REPRESSION OF CHRISTIANS; WILL THE POPE BE SAFE IN INDIA?

HON. EDOLPHUS TOWNS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, November 4, 1999

Mr. TOWNS. Mr. Speaker, on October 28, the New York Post ran an excellent article by Rod Dreher exposing the tyranny of what he called "Hindu brownshirts" who run India. He notes that the Pope is heading to India soon and wonders if the Pope and his entourage will be safe in the face of this religious violence.

Dreher wrote that "a small but violent faction of Hindu fundamentalists aligned with the Hindu nationalist government have been conducting an organized campaign against the Pope as part of a concerted effort to demonize and persecute the country's tiny Christian minority."

In the article, Dreher states that there were 108 cases of beatings, stonings, church burnings, looting of religious schools, and other attacks on Christians. Freedom House, a widely respected human-rights monitoring organization, reports that there have been more incidents of violence against Indian Christians in the past year than in the previous 50 years, even though Christians make up just 3 percent of India's population.

Missionary Graham Staines and his two young sons were burned to death in their Jeeps by a Hindu mob affiliated with the ruling party. The Hindu militants surrounded the jeep and chanted "Victory to Lord Ram." Last month, Hindu fundamentalists kidnapped a nun named Sister Ruby and forced her to drink their body fluids. These are only two of so many incidents that I have lost count.

There have been cases of forcible reconversion to Hinduism along with the violent incidents against Christians and Christian institutions. Many of us have been standing here discussing this, yet it continues to go on in a country that continues to proclaim itself democratic.

It is not just the Christians. The persecution of Sikhs and Muslims has been well documented in this body time and time again. India has killed over 200,000 Christians since independence, and it has also murdered over 250,000 Sikhs, more than 65,000 Muslims, and tens of thousands of others. The highest shrines of India's Sikh and Muslim communities have been attacked by the Indian government.

It is clear that there is no religious freedom in "democratic" India. How can we be upset about China's persecution of Falun Gong and turn our heads when India practices oppression on Christians, Sikhs, Muslims, and others?

It is our responsibility as the leader of the Free World to help ensure freedom for everyone on the planet. We must subject India to the same penalties we impose on any other country that violates religious freedom. We should stop our aid to India until it respects basic human rights, including religious freedom. We should put the Congress on record in support of self-determination for all the minority nations that India is victimizing. Finally, I call on President Clinton to stress these human rights and self determination issues when he visits India early next year.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to put Mr. Dreher's article into the RECORD for the information of my colleagues.

POPE'S PASSAGE TO INDIA MAY BE MOST PERILOUS YET

[From the New York Post, Oct. 28, 1999]

(By Fred Dreher)

Will Pope John Paul II be safe in India? There is more reason to worry for the pontiff's welfare as he visits the world's largest democracy next week than there was when he went to communist Poland under martial law.

That's because a small but violent faction of Hindu fundamentalists aligned with the Hindu nationalist government have been conducting an organized campaign against the pope as part of a concerted effort to demonize and persecute the country's tiny Christian minority.

The government promises to protect the Holy Father from coalition fanatics. But while John Paul can rely on state security, his Catholic followers and Protestant brethren remain at the mercy of Hindu brownshirts.

These thugs have carried out vicious attacks on Christians since a coalition led by the hard-line Bharatiya Janata Party (BJP) came to power two years ago.

Freedom House, the Washington-based human-rights organization, says there have been more recorded incidents of violence against India's Christian minority in the past year than in the previous half-century.

The most shocking incident took place in January, when Hindu thugs burned alive Australian missionary Graham Staines and his two little boys. That was far from a isolated incident.

In 1998, the Catholic Bishop's Conference in India reported 108 cases of beatings, stonings, church burnings, looting of religious schools and institutions, and other attacks on Catholics and evangelicals.

It has been just as bad this year. Just last month, a Catholic priest working in the same territory as the Staines family was murdered while saying Mass for converts, his heart pierced by a poison-tipped arrow.

Why the attacks? Hindu nationalist leaders, particularly those associated with the BJP-allied World Hindu Congress (VHP), claim Christians are on "conversion overdrive."

This is preposterous. Despite being present in India for almost 2,000 years, and educating hundreds of millions of Indian children, Christianity claims the allegiance of less than 3 percent of the country's people.

Even in Orissa state, site of the worst anti-Christian violence, fewer than 500 conversions occur each year.

Still, Hindu nationalists continue to make wild-eyed assertions, such as VHP leader Mohan Joshi's recent statement that missionary homes run by Mother Teresa's order were "nothing but conversion centers."

Not true, but if it were, so what?

We know perfectly well what would have become of the diseased and the destitute had Mother Teresa's nuns not rescued them from the street: They would have been left to die in the gutter condemned by a culture that decrees these lowborn souls deserve their fate.

"What has the VHP done to better the life of the low castes? The answer is nothing," says Freedom House investigator Joseph Assad.

"When I was in India, I talked to one Christian who was forcibly reconverted to Hinduism. He told me when no one cared for us, Christians came and gave us food, gave us shelter and gave us medicine."

An Indian Protestant activist who lives in New Jersey told me BJP rule has meant open season on followers of Christ.

"The last two years have been unprecedented," the man says. "They have burned chuches down, raped nuns, killed people. We complain to the government, but they look the other way."

The Hindu militants certainly do not represent the sentiments of all Hindus. But these thugs have the tacit support and protection of the ruling BJP. Indeed, the BJP Web site condemns ''Semitic monotheism''—Judaism, Christianity and Islam—for ''bringing intolerance to India.''

This is what is known to professional propagandists as the Big Lie. No wonder Hindu hard-liners confidently pillage Christian communities.

How many more Hindu-led atrocities will Christians and others suffer before Prime Minister Atal Behari Vajpayee calls off the nationalist dogs?

Will it take a physical assault on the Holy Father for the world to wake up to the kind of place Gandhi's great nation has become.

IN HONOR OF THE PUERTO RICAN ASSOCIATION FOR HUMAN DEVELOPMENT, INC., ON ITS 25TH ANNIVERSARY GALA CELEBRATION

HON. ROBERT MENENDEZ

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, November 4, 1999

Mr. MENENDEZ. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to recognize the Puerto Rican Association for Human Development, Inc., for 25 years of hard work and dedication to the residents of Middlesex County, the State of New Jersey, and the Hispanic community.

For years, PRAHD has been committed to improving the standard for living of Hispanic families through the administration of programs and services which address the social, economic, health, and educational status of these communities.

Founded in 1974 as a charitable organization by the Hispanic leadership of the Perth Amboy area, the Puerto Rican Association for Human Development operates a number of service programs. From day care, educational tutoring, and youth and family counseling, to emergency legal, housing, and medical assistance, drug prevention, and various senior services, the PRAHD serve more than 12,000 people annually. The agency creates alliances with other organizations to help revitalize communities by assisting people link needs with resources.

Since its inception, PRAHD has expanded to a comprehensive service agency with a budget of more than 1.6 million dollars through funding from federal, state, county, and city governments; the United Way of New Jersey; the United Way of Tri-County/IBM; the Turrell Fund; local corporations; and individual donors.

The agency is governed by an eleven-member board of directors selected from the community, and is administered by Executive Director Lydia Trinidad, who is also PRAHD's Chief Executive Officer. PRAHD also relies on the support and effort of community volunteers who work in all areas of agency operations.

For its unwavering commitment to the residents of New Jersey and its continued efforts on behalf of Hispanics, I ask that my colleagues join me in recognizing the outstanding work of the Puerto Rican Association for Human Development on its 25th Anniversary.

IN RECOGNITION OF THE INAUGURATION OF DR. MARGUERITE ARCHIE-HUDSON AS PRESIDENT OF TALLADEGA COLLEGE

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, November 4, 1999

Mr. RILEY. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to congratulate Dr. Marguerite Archie-Hudson on the occasion of her inauguration on November 7, 1999, as the 17th President of Talladega College in Talladega, Alabama. Dr. Archie-Hudson will be the first woman to hold this position and the first African-American woman to head a four-year institution in the State of Alabama.

Dr. Archie-Hudson began her affiliation with Talladega College when she attended the college on a full four-year scholarship and obtained a Bachelor's degree in psychology. Following her graduation in 1958, she continued her education at Harvard University, where she obtained a Masters of Education degree. She received her Ph.D. in Higher Education from the University of California in Los Angeles. In 1996, she became a member of the Talladega College Board of Trustees and has served as interim president of the college since July of 1998.

Dr. Archie-Hudson has served in many capacities in higher education in California. She was Associate Dean in the California State University System and Administrator at UCLA's College of Letters and Science. She also served from 1990–1996 as a member of the California State Legislature representing the 48th Assembly District of Los Angeles. While in the Legislature, she chaired the Committee on Higher Education and pursued policy issues in education, health, economic development and children and families. She led the campaign to build the new $129 million California Science Center in Exposition Park in her district. This is considered one of the most innovative science education facilities in the country.

Dr. Archie-Hudson served as the first nonlawyer member of the Board of Governors of the State Bar of California, the College Commission on Judicial Nominees Evaluation and the California Committee of Bar Examiners. She was elected as a trustee of the Los Angeles Community College District and appointed as Vice President of the California Museum of Science and Industry Foundation. Besides her professional and civic affiliations in California, Dr. Archie-Hudson served for 8 years on the KNBC Public Affairs Program, ''Free-4-All.''

I am delighted that Dr. Archie-Hudson has returned to Talladega College. I know that she is an inspiration for the students who attend this fine college because of what she has accomplished with her life and her active involvement in the Talladega community. I am proud to salute Dr. Marguerite Archie-Hudson as the new President of Talladega College.

CONFERENCE REPORT ON H.R. 3064, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATIONS ACT, 2000

SPEECH OF

HON. FORTNEY PETE STARK

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, October 28, 1999

Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, I rise today in opposition to the DC/Labor-HHS bill's 3-month moratorium on the Secretary of Health and Human Services (HHS) organ allocation regulations which the President yesterday cited in his veto message as a highly objectionable provision. I also rise today in objection to the Organ Procurement and Transplantation Network Amendments of 1999 (H.R. 2418)—a bill to amend and reauthorize the National Organ Transplant Act of 1984.

Over 63,000 Americans are currently awaiting an organ transplant. Almost 5,000 people die each year in this country waiting for an organ transplant. Unfortunately, the current system is based on geographic boundaries—so that while a patient in one State may wait 21 days for an organ transplant, a patient in another State may wait an average of over 300 days.

The HHS organ allocation regulation attempts to move to a system based on medical necessity instead of geography. As the President stated yesterday: ''This rule, which was strongly validated by an Institute of Medicine (IoM) report, provides a more equitable system of treatment . . . its implementation would likely prevent the deaths of hundreds of Americans.'' The HHS regulation incorporates comments from the transplant community, patients, and the general public to ensure the neediest patients receive organs first—regardless of where they live.

However, the DC/Labor-HHS bill delays the HHS Secretary's organ allocation rules. The current 90-day moratorium may not sound like a lot of time—but to patients awaiting transplants, every day counts.

Furthermore, during those 3 months, much can be accomplished by those who oppose the Secretary's regulation. For example, the Organ Procurement and Transplantation Network Amendments of 1999 (H.R. 2418) could reach the House floor. H.R. 2418 would render moot the recently revised HHS organ allocation regulations. Further, the bill would remove the Secretary's legitimate authority to oversee the program, provide unreasonable protections for the current contractor, while it simultaneously makes data less available to the public.

The United Network for Organ Sharing (UNOS) is the current private contractor in charge of distributing organs procured for transplant. H.R. 2418 essentially gives UNOS a monopoly on the contract. I am submitting the following article from the most recent issue of Forbes magazine as further evidence of the need to oppose legislation which protects the current contractor and of the imperative need to oppose any delay of the HHS organ allocation regulation:

[From Forbes Magazine, Nov. 1, 1999]

THE ORGAN KING

(By Brigid McMenamin)

Ever since Forbes exposed the federal monopoly that's chilling the supply of transplantable organs and letting Americans who need them die needlessly (Forbes, Mar. 11, 1996), Health & Human Services Secretary Donna Shalala has been trying to challenge the way United Network for Organ Sharing operates.

But the Richmond, Va.-based cartel will have none of it. Using a heavy-handed mix of litigation, lobbying and bullying of its opponents, UNOS has solidified its position as the federal contractor in charge of deciding which people get new kidneys, livers or hearts.

Under the UNOS system, most organs are shared only within 62 regional territories. A potential recipient in, say, New York, where donations are low, can expect to wait months for an organ to show up, even though there may be so many donors across the river in New Jersey that New Jersey patients are getting transplants after short waits or when they are far from desperate.

Though UNOS has begun to relax the locals-first policy, still, last year 4,855 Americans died while waiting for transplants. (This doesn't even count people pulled off the list after they became too sick to handle a transplant.) It is a matter of debate how much lower the number of deaths would be if the system for obtaining and allocating organs were more rational. But Consad, a research outfit in Pittsburgh, estimates that at least 1,000 people die needlessly each year.

When Shalala urged that organs be shared over wider regions, UNOS Executive Director Walter K. Graham refused. He decreed, in a memo to his member hospitals and organ banks, that UNOS doesn't have to take direction from the federal government on this point.

UNOS' main source of funding is the $375 registration fee potential organ recipients must pay to get on the waiting list. That amounts to some $13 million a year, money that is supposed to be spent mostly to match organs with suitable recipients. In reality, at best half of the money goes to that.

What about the rest? Graham and his 40 board members spend some $1 million each year on jetting around and on meetings and conferences. A new $7 million headquarters building is planned. In 1997, some $1.6 million went for items network officials refuse to explain. ''They really never tell you what they're spending money on,'' says veteran board member John Fung, a liver surgeon at the University of Pittsburgh.

When Shalala tried to exert more control over the rising registration fees, Graham challenged her in a proceeding before the U.S. General Accounting Office, claiming she had no right even to know how he spent the fees. The suit was settled; Shalala backed down.

Why not simply bring in another contractor to ration organs? Good luck. The congressional committee in charge of such matters is headed by Representative Thomas Bliley, from UNOS' home city of Richmond. His cousin Paul S. Bliley is a law partner of UNOS lawyer Malcolm E. (Dick) Ritsch. Last fall, then-Louisiana Congressman Robert Livingston, whose home state includes eight profitable transplant centers, pushed through a bill halting further attempts by Shalala to control the contractor.

After the Senate rejected this moratorium, Livingston got it tacked onto another bill behind closed doors by threatening to hold up funding for the International Monetary Fund. The moratorium ends Oct. 21. But UNOS has already had Wisconsin Congressman David Obey tack another one-year extension onto a bill that was set to go to the full House for a vote in October. His state's four transplant centers stand to lose organs if UNOS loses its grip.

Craig Howe, executive director of the National Marrow Donor Program, recently expressed interest in having his organization bid on the organ contract. After UNOS found out he was interested, his board members, who include 14 physicians, axed him. Although some powerful and prominent surgeons like Fung are an exception, most doctors involved in the business fear offending UNOS lest their organ supply be affected.

In another instance FORBES is aware of, UNOS threatened to retaliate against an outfit it perceived as a rival bidder for the organ allocation job.

Tax-exempt groups like UNOS are supposed to make their financial statements available for public perusal. But UNOS hides significant activity behind two little-known affiliates that aren't required to disclose anything.

The first is the UNOS Foundation, a six-year-old shadow organization run by UNOS staffers. Spokesman Robert Spieldenner claims the foundation doesn't have to file tax returns because it brings in less than $25,000 a year. The UNOS Foundation owns something called the Transplant Informatics Institute, a for-profit company run by organ network staffers. Transplants Informatics is so secret that even some UNOS board members are unaware that it exists.

What does the institute do? The government thinks it markets UNOS-developed software to organ network members. In an audit looking into the use of registration fees for lobbying, the Office of the Inspector General got just that impression. What the institute really does is analyze and sell organ network data to profit-making companies like Fujisawa, the Japanese firm that sells drugs for transplant patients. When the institute has not been able to cover its costs with such sales, UNOS has used its registration fee income to make up the difference. Prospective organ recipients are therefore effectively funding this hidden business.

You'd think someone on UNOS' board would scream bloody murder about all this. After all, the 40-person board is almost half doctors, dedicated to saving lives. But the directors have little idea what's going on. ''The board is kind of in the dark,'' sighs patient advocate Charles Fiske, a former board member.

''We received an annual financial report and pretty much accepted it as written,'' says University of Oklahoma transplant doctor Larry R. Pennington, a board member from 1996 to 1998. They really don't know how to interpret the data. ''All I'm familiar with is hospital sort of activity,'' admits transplant physician William Harmon.

Realizing that UNOS is out of control, Shalala has put out feelers for a replacement. ''I hope we have some bidders this time,'' sighs Claude Fox, a pediatrician who, as administrator of the Health Resources & Services Administration, oversees transplants for Shalala. The only prospect so far is Santa Monica-based Rand.

Determined to see that Rand does not walk off with the contract, UNOS' lobbyists are pushing for a law that would insure that Graham's group will keep the contract forever. Last month Bliley's committee held hearings on a bill which would require the organ rationing contractor to have experience, something no group but UNOS has. It would also allow UNOS' members to vote on the choice.

''Anything that gives them more of a stranglehold isn't in the public interest,'' says Fox. ''It's like giving the EPA to some land-fill company,'' says Dr. Fung.

It would be nice if UNOS didn't have a lock on this business. Better still if the federal government stepped out of the process altogether and let doctors come up with creative ways to increase the supply of organs. (How about giving people who sign up as potential donors when they are young some priority in getting organs when they are older?) Once there are enough hearts and livers to go around, there won't be unaccountable arbiters holding sway over our lives.

IN SPECIAL RECOGNITION OF DICK G. LAM, JR.

HON. EDOLPHUS TOWNS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, November 4, 1999

Mr. TOWNS. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to recognize the accomplishments of Dick G. Lam, Jr. He has been instrumental in developing and implementing economic and academic development programs. Dick remains committed to improving the quality of life in his community. Presently, Dick is the President of Operation Salvation for Youth (OSY). As the president, he directs a Brooklyn based organization devoted to helping youth gain digital literacy and access to new technology. In the program, special emphasis is placed on welfare mothers who have young children. The OSY is currently working with the New York City Housing Authority, the Miracle Makers, Inc., and several private firms on the development of a new project.

Dick's work continues to provide a foundation for social progress. As a Senior Fellow for the Department of Urban Affairs and Planning at Hunter College, he worked to develop a Spatial Analysis Management System to analyze a range of urban problems, including transportation, housing and welfare to work issues. Dick also holds advisory positions as the Senior U.S. Consultant to the Tianjin Municipal Utility Bureau, The Peoples Republic of China and the Senior U.S. Consultant to the All China Taxi Association, The Peoples Republic of China.

Our community is a better place today because Dick has chosen to commit himself to urban renewal and development. Dick has accomplished his objectives by working in key positions such as: Director of the Mayor's Office of Midtown Manhattan Planning and Development, New York City, Director of Transportation and Regional Planning, New York City Planning Commission, and Special Assistant to the Deputy Under Secretary, United States Department of Transportation. Our society is a better place today because of the contributions made by Dick.

I commend Dick G. Lam, Jr. and pray that he will succeed in all future endeavors.

IN HONOR OF MR. RAMON DE LA CRUZ, PRESIDENT OF THE HISPANIC BAR ASSOCIATION OF NEW JERSEY, FOR HIS OUTSTANDING ACHIEVEMENTS THIS YEAR

HON. ROBERT MENENDEZ

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, November 4, 1999

Mr. MENENDEZ. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to recognize Mr. Ramon de la Cruz, President of the Hispanic Bar Association of New Jersey, for his outstanding work on behalf of the Hispanic Community.

An active member of the Hispanic Bar Association for more than ten years, Mr. de la Cruz was recently appointed as the New Jersey Regional President of the organization. And he has shown continued commitment to its growth and success.

From fighting racial profiling and domestic violence, to battling against anti-diversity efforts across the country, the Hispanic Bar Association has been a motivating and unifying force for the Hispanic community in New Jersey under Mr. de la Cruz's leadership.

In addition, Mr. de la Cruz and the H.B.A. of New Jersey have worked extensively with several associations to bring attention to the lack of Hispanic representation on the New Jersey federal judiciary. Because of his efforts and vision, Mr. de la Cruz was instrumental in the recent recommendation of New Jersey's first ever Hispanic to be nominated to the U.S. Court of Appeals of the Third District in the State.

Knowing the importance of a clear and unified message from the H.B.A., Mr. de la Cruz served as editor of ABOGADO, the official newsletter of the Hispanic Bar Association of New Jersey, Inc., for four years. Highlighting the accomplishments of fellow Hispanic abogados y abogadas, as well as confronting the tough issues that the Hispanic community faces, Mr. de la Cruz's work has made the newsletter an informative report to the community.

For all of these achievements and for his remarkable leadership, I ask my colleagues to join me in congratulating Mr. de la Cruz and the H.B.A. on another year of hard work and dedication to both the Hispanic community and the State of New Jersey.

INTRODUCING THE SOCIAL SECURITY NUMBER CONFIDENTIALITY ACT OF 1999

HON. KEN CALVERT

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, November 4, 1999

Mr. CALVERT. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to introduce the Social Security Number Confidentiality Act of 1999. In a time of increasingly easier access to personal information by people other than the owner of that information, ''Identity Theft'' is becoming more and more of a problem.

Given this significant problem, I found it alarming to learn from senior citizens in my district that the Social Security Administration openly displays a recipient's Social Security number, name and address in the window of the envelope. This same envelope makes its way through the United States Postal system.

By simply taking a quick peek in a mailbox, or in a pile of mail left in a person's car, anyone could obtain the information needed to steal someone's identity. The open display of such private and confidential information is an invitation for scam artists to rip off our senior citizens.

As I investigated this situation, I found that the Social Security Administration knowingly continues this practice. At the same time they advocate the need to keep Social Security numbers confidential.

Ironically, in the July/August issue of Social Security Today, the agency advises us that, ''All the information Social Security collects about you is kept confidential: it's protected by law,'' and reminds us to ''protect your Social Security number. Be careful how you use it and keep it confidential whenever possible.''

Mr. Speaker, this is a glaring inconsistency that requires immediate attention. My legislation will prohibit the appearance of Social Security numbers on or through the window of unopened Social Security checks. It will allow the Social Security Administration to practice what they preach—that we all need to be careful and keep our Social Security numbers private and confidential. In all fairness, the checks are printed by the Department of Treasury, and my legislation will direct them to change their procedures.

In closing, I ask my colleagues on both sides of the aisle to join me in supporting the Social Security Number Confidentiality Act of 1999. This important legislation protects our senior citizens from scam artists and maintains the privacy and confidentiality of our Social Security numbers.

TRIBUTE TO TODD STORZ

HON. LEE TERRY

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, November 4, 1999

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to honor Todd Storz by marking the 50th anniversary of the creation of the Mid-Continent Broadcasting Company, later known as the Storz Broadcasting Company.

Todd Storz developed the radio rotation format known as ''Top 40.'' This innovation made rock and roll a part of American history and changed the sound of radio forever. Through his Mid-Continent Broadcasting Company, Todd Storz initially influenced radio in Omaha, Kansas City, St. Louis, and New Orleans. Soon, other radio stations adapted their formats to the ''Top 40'' rotation style. His pioneering work in radio made popular music a component of American culture.

Todd Storz's idea for ''Top 40'' radio came about through competition with a rival station that featured a one hour ''Top 20'' radio show. The two hour ''Top 40'' format won over listeners as well as other radio programmers. As a result, it soon became the standard format. The Mid-Continent Broadcasting Company's successful approach to radio broadcasting helped radio survive and flourish in spite of the popularity of television.

I encourage my colleagues to join me in honoring Todd Storz on the 50th anniversary of the founding of his Mid-Continent Broadcasting Company.

IN SPECIAL RECOGNITION OF SAM GUBODIA

HON. EDOLPHUS TOWNS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, November 4, 1999

Mr. TOWNS. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to recognize the accomplishments of Sam Gubodia. Sam, a native of Nigeria, has dedicated his life to the academic and economic empowerment of our community. He strives to improve the quality of life for African Americans and the African World. Our society needs more educators and business leaders like Sam because he has helped to rebuild our community. Sam has utilized his knowledge and skills to make positive changes in the African American community.

Before and after completing his doctorate degree in International Finance, Sam has worked diligently to uplift African American and African World people. Upon arriving in the United States, Sam embarked on a promising academic and career path. He worked as a Consular Assistant at the Nigerian Consulate General. As a student at Stony Brook, Sam held many notable positions: for example, he was President, African Students Organization (1977–1979), and he organized several clothing drives for the people of South Africa and Zimbabwe, and he served a President of the Third World Graduate Students Organization (1980).

While attending graduate school at Stony Brook, Sam realized that he would be a great service to his community if he pursued an academic profession, and from there he began to work as an educator. Sam has held many positions as an educator: He taught at Bendel State University, The University of Benin, Stony Brook, and The College of New Rochelle. Currently, Dr. Gubodia is an exemplary Grade Leader-Advisor for the Honors Economic Program at Boys and Girls High School. The lives of many people have been enriched because of Sam, and our community appreciates the important role that he has played as an educator. Sam is also a published scholar, and we appreciate his innovative ideas on economic development.

I commend Sam Gubodia and pray that he will succeed in all future endeavors.

CONFERENCE REPORT ON H.R. 3064, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATIONS ACT, 2000

SPEECH OF

HON. DENNIS MOORE

OF KANSAS

Thursday, October 28, 1999

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, I rise to express my profound disappointment with the legislative process in this chamber and the bill that is before us today.

In the House of Representatives, we have one primary duty—to pass the thirteen annual appropriations bills. Today, one day before the scheduled adjournment date, we have not yet completed our work on five of the thirteen. To add insult to injury, we are being asked to vote on a ''pre-conferenced'' Labor-HHS-Education spending bill that this House has not the opportunity to debate and amend under regular order.

To say that the bill before us today misrepresents national priorities would be false—in fact, the bill before us today represents no priorities. Perhaps, if the House had an opportunity to address this bill in the normal fashion—with debate, amendment and compromise—the House could have come to consensus as it has for the past 105 Congresses. Of course the federal government can cut 1% of fat—but to blindly cut that 1% across the board is lazy and irresponsible.

Mr. Speaker, the priorities of the Kansans that I represent are ill-served by this hamhanded approach to legislating that is before us today. This bill would block grant the class-size reduction initiative enacted by Congress last year, and deny $200 million needed to hire 8,000 new teachers. A 1% across-the-board reduction would cut benefits for 71,000 needy individuals benefiting from supplemental nutrition program for Women, Infants and Children (WIC). It would result in 1.3 million fewer ''Meals on Wheels'' delivered to shut-in seniors and 4,888 fewer low-income children being able to benefit from the highly successful Head Start program.

I am voting against this bill today hoping that the House will go back to the drawing board and, like the Senate, set responsible spending levels that reflect our priorities as a nation.

IN HONOR OF THE WEST HOBOKEN SOCIAL & ATHLETIC ASSOCIATION OF UNION CITY, NEW JERSEY, ON ITS 50TH ANNIVERSARY

HON. ROBERT MENENDEZ

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, November 4, 1999

Mr. MENENDEZ. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to recognize the West Hoboken Social & Athletic Association of Union City, New Jersey, for its hard work and dedicated service to the community for the past fifty years.

Organized after World War II to reunite friends and foster continued camaraderie, the WHSA championed public and private causes in an effort to follow its motto, ''service to the community.''

During the early years, the association sponsored several sports teams to encourage youth involvement in athletics. Today, it continues that tradition by offering youth athletic programs and positive adult role models as coaches. The WHSA was instrumental in providing the necessary financial aid and guidance to one young athlete who competed in the World Special Olympics.

The WHSA has developed programs to help the members of their communities by providing a summer camp program for underprivileged children, awarding savings bonds to school children for higher education with the ''Edward Trevelese History Award,'' and organizing companionship and entertainment for the elderly through the ''Walter Scarpetta Nursing Home Volunteers'' program. The WHSA continues to work with other organizations and charities such as the American Red Cross, Salvation Army, and United Cerebral Palsy, providing expertise, leadership, and support.

For its service to the residents of the West Hoboken community in the State of New Jersey, and its long tradition of active leadership, I ask that my colleagues join me in honoring the West Hoboken Social & Athletic Association and all of its members as it celebrates its 50th anniversary.

IN SPECIAL RECOGNITION OF PEGGY RODGERS

HON. EDOLPHUS TOWNS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, November 4, 1999

Mr. TOWNS. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to recognize the accomplishments of Peggy Rodgers. Peggy is a community activist who has dedicated her time to assisting people in need. As a volunteer in State Senator John Sampson's office, she focuses on helping senior citizens and homeless people. She diligently works on finding adequate housing for senior citizens and the homeless.

Peggy is a hard working model citizen. After graduating from Canarsie High School, she went on to attend Brooklyn College. At Brooklyn College, Peggy recognized her interest in business, and, as a result, she decided to pursue an education at the Robert Finance Business Institute, where she received a certificate in Business Management. Upon completion of her studies, Peggy worked at Merrill Lynch Brokerage Firm in Accounts Receivable.

The commitment and drive exhibited by Peggy continues to greatly benefit our community. She understands that one must remain politically active in order to bring about improvements in our society. She has been out in the trenches struggling to ensure that competent, qualified, and concerned people hold the elected positions in her community. She continues to function as an active member of the Breukelen Tenants Association.

In describing Peggy, I would have to use the words, motivated, cooperative, and charitable. The needs of other people are paramount to Peggy. I commend Peggy Rodgers and pray that she will succeed in all future endeavors.

TRIBUTE TO U.S. ARMY COMMAND SERGEANT MAJOR RONALD W. BEDFORD—A REAL AMERICAN HERO

HON. TERRY EVERETT

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, November 4, 1999

Mr. EVERETT. Mr. Speaker, our society has cheapened the name of heroes today by elevating millionaire movie, music and sports stars while ignoring those Americans who perform unselfish acts of courage and sacrifice. I wish to pay tribute to an American whose character and actions truly define heroism.

On September 2, the 54th anniversary of VJ-DAY, U.S. Army Command Sergeant Major Donald W. Bedford, began a 1,500 mile journey from Mobile, Alabama to Washington, DC. His trek, which takes him through six states and the District of Columbia, is remarkable because it is entirely on foot. But CSM Bedford is not walking this enormous distance to set any record. Instead, he is striding the 71-day route to bring attention to and raise funding for the construction of a national memorial to honor America's greatest generation of heroes—those who fought in World War II.

Bedford, an ex-airborne infantryman now stationed at Fort Rucker, Alabama in my congressional district, came up with the idea of the walk after learning that there was no national memorial for the 16 million Americans who served and sacrificed to liberate the world from Nazi and Japanese occupation in World War II. His efforts to help raise money for the on-going World War II Memorial fund have gained the support of the Non-Commissioned Officers Association, and the praise of former Senator Bob Dole, who chairs the World War II Memorial Committee.

CSM Bedford's journey of 2,792,000 steps will take him through 144 cities and 15 military installations before he arrives at Arlington National Cemetery on November 11. From there, he will cross Memorial Bridge, pass by the Lincoln Memorial, and then proceed to the spot on the national mall where the World War II Memorial will be built next year.

I salute CSM Bedford for his personal sacrifice and dedication to America's greatest generation and I join all Americans in welcoming him to Washington this Veterans' Day.

WITHDRAW COSPONSORSHIP OF H.R. 2528

HON. XAVIER BECERRA

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, November 4, 1999

Mr. BECERRA. Mr. Speaker, today I withdraw my cosponsorship of H.R. 2528. I was an original cosponsor of H.R. 2528, the Immigration Reorganization and Improvement Act of 1999, because I support any effort to jumpstart—or better put, restart—the Immigration and Naturalization Service (INS). Chairman HAROLD ROGERS, Chairman LAMAR SMITH and Representative SILVESTRE REYES have worked diligently to fashion a restructuring bill and are doing what they believed best moves us toward that end. I had concerns about the bill when I first signed on. But I felt it was important to support efforts to restructure the INS. I had hoped H.R. 2528 would move in a direction addressing my concerns. However, at this stage I find that the current status of the bill falls short of meeting the elements necessary to make it a meaningful reform that will place the INS on solid footing to effectively address its obligations.

History has shown that the INS does not receive the resources necessary to carry out its duties in the area of services and adjudication. This is why the backlog of pending naturalization applications grew to approximately 2.0 million and currently stands at approximately 1.4 million. Far too many of those backlogged applicants waited or have been waiting over 2 years for their cases to be adjudicated. The backlog and delay in other adjudication areas—adjustments of status and the green card replacement program, for instance—are as bad if not worse than for naturalization. As such, my primary concern pertains to the financing mechanisms within the INS for the services and adjudication functions of the agency. Current law and its implementation fail to meet this challenge. And H.R. 2528 falls far short as well. So long as we continue to require fees collected from immigrants for a particular service to pay for non-fee activities, we will always run into budgetary problems and services will suffer. H.R. 2528 authorizes no funds whatsoever for backlog reduction or asylum and refugee processing. This additional strain on already stretched resources, with no additional funding, will only exacerbate the backlogs as well as undermine the United States' ability to meet the protection needs of refugees and asylum seekers.

I am also seriously concerned that H.R. 2528 does not go the necessary mile to ensure that these newly independent agencies of the Department of Justice's immigration until function properly under the oversight and direction of a principal executive. While autonomy for the enforcement and service agencies will allow them to perfect and specialize in their areas of responsibility, too much distance between them could foil the ability of the Department of Justice to direct, coordinate and integrate the overlap in enforcement and service functions. The latest version of H.R. 2528 improves upon the original bill by adding an Assistant Attorney General as that principal in charge. However, it maintains three separate legal and policy offices which will lead to multiple interpretations of immigration, refugee and asylum law. This structure will bear three bureaucracies instead of one and cultivate confusion among the three arms of the agency.

I am committed to continuing to work with the authors of H.R. 2528 along with the Immigration Subcommittee members and the Clinton administration to strengthen the structure of the INS so that it can finally, rightfully handle all duties under its charge. The people of America who must turn to the INS for services—and who happen to pay the taxes and fees to fund this and all other government operations—deserve no less.

TRIBUTE TO LEVI PEARSON

HON. JAMES E. CLYBURN

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, November 4, 1999

Mr. CLYBURN. Mr. Speaker, this Saturday, November 6, 1999, the South Carolina Department of Archives and History will dedicate a historic marker to honor Levi Pearson, a leader in the civil rights movement in Clarendon County, South Carolina. Mr. Pearson personified great courage, leadership and perseverance in his role as a plaintiff in Pearson v. County Board of Education (1948) which led to the historic May 17, 1954 Supreme Court decision outlawing separate and unequal schools. Recordings of the civil rights movement in South Carolina rank him among the state's most outstanding pioneers for equality in education. Many local and national events, news articles, books and television documentaries recognize his role in the struggle which led to the Supreme Court's decision. Simple Justice by Richard Kluger and Stepping Stones to the Supreme Court by Benjamin F. Hornsby, Jr. are two publications that depict many of the details of Mr. Pearson's trial.

For background, Mr. Speaker, I wish to enter for the record information from an article which was written as a tribute to him when he was inducted into the South Carolina Black Hall of Fame:

''An obscure country farmer, Levi Pearson never dreamed that his legal action on behalf of black children in Summerton, South Carolina would figure in the historic May 17, 1954 U.S. Supreme Court decision outlawing separate and unequal schools. They are role models and an inspiration to all who value freedom and justice. As a partner, in the Clarendon County insurrection led by the Rev. Joseph Albert Delaine, Levi Pearson had unshakable faith in the victory of justice over an entrenched social order that seemed all but immovable.

Black children in Summerton attended ramshackle Scott's Branch School, while white children attended classes in a modern facility. White school board officials said white folks paid most of the taxes, so white people were therefore entitled to better schools. There were 30 school buses for whites in Clarendon County. None for Blacks. Some black youngsters had to make their way for nine miles across an arm of newly-formed Lake Marion. One child drowned as they paddled a boat. Appeals to schools officials for transportation such as that offered white failed. The school officials even refused to buy gas for an old bus the blacks bought.

Farmer Levi Pearson, father of three children at Scott's Branch School (Daisy, James, and Eloise) was persuaded to bring a suit on behalf of his son, James. A black man suing white folks * * * no such thing had happened before in the memory of blacks living in Clarendon County. Levi Pearson was an instant hero among his people. But a threat to the white establishment. His credit was cut off by every white-owned store and bank in the county. He had enough money to buy seeds for the cotton, tobacco, oats and wheat he planted, but not enough for fertilizer. He had to cut timber to sell for cash, and borrow from hard-pressed blacks to buy fertilizer. That Autumn he couldn't rent a harvester from a white farmer, so he sat and watched as his harvest of oats and beans and wheat rot in the field. Three months after he filed the lawsuit, it was thrown out because of a technicality that he paid taxes in School District Five, while his children were going to school in District 26 for the high school and District 22 for the Grammar School. Another pupil's parent, Harry Briggs, Sr., filed suit a year later. He and Pearson had to flee for their lives many times. Briggs and his family lived in Florida and New York for 20 years before returning to Summerton in the 1970's but Mr. Pearson never left. Ultimately, their case was consolidated with similar cases from three other States in an action known as Brown vs. Board of Education, upon which the door to equal education opportunity was opened in the Supreme Court's Decision of May 17, 1954.''

Mr. Pearson never sought fame or notoriety, but stood up for what he felt was right. I am reminded of the speech the late Dr. Martin Luther King gave about the ''Drum Major Instinct.'' A few excerpts go like this:

''* * * everybody can be great. Because everybody can serve. You don't have to have a college degree to serve. You don't have to make your subject and your verb agree to serve. You don't have to know about Plato and Aristotle to serve. You don't have to know Einstein's theory of relativity to serve. You don't have to know the second theory of thermodynamics in physics to serve. You only need a heart full of grace. A soul generated by love. And you can be that servant.

''* * * Every now and then I guess we all think realistically about that day when we will be victimized with what is life's final common denominator—that something we call death. We all think about it. And every now and then I think about my own death, and I think about my own funeral. and I don't think of it in a morbid sense. Every now and then I ask myself, ''What is it that I would want said? And I leave the word to you this morning.

''* * * If I can help somebody as I pass along, if I can cheer somebody with a word or song, if I can show somebody he's traveling wrong, then my living will not be in vain. If I can do my duty as a Christian ought, if I can bring salvation to a world once wrought, if I can spread the message as the master taught, then my living will not be in vain.

Yes, Jesus, I want to be on your right side or your left side, not for any selfish reason. I want to be on your right or your best side, not in terms of some political kingdom or ambition, but I just want to be there in love and in justice and in truth and in commitment to others, so that we can make of this old world a new world.''

Mr. Pearson, and Mr. and Mrs. Briggs are now deceased. However, Mr. Pearson's widow still vividly remembers his struggles and this historic period in our Nation's history. Mr. Pearson lived a Christian and committed life for justice and we all know that his living was not in vain. Mr. Speaker, thank you and my colleagues for joining me in honoring the Levi Pearson who increased educational opportunities for children across the country.

HONORING AMERICA'S VETERANS

HON. DONALD A. MANZULLO

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, November 5, 1999

Mr. MANZULLO. Mr. Speaker, one year ago I had the privilege of participating in a memorable Veterans Day program at the Alden-Hebron Elementary School in Hebron, Illinois, in the district I represent. That was a special day for me in many ways. I will never forget having the honor of presenting the Bronze Star to CPL Harold Myers, the school's custodian, for his bravery during the Battle of the Bulge. His gallantry in the service of his country was a reminder of why we commemorate Veterans Day.

It was also heartwarming to witness a new generation of young Americans coming to understand and acknowledge the sacrifices made by past generations of American veterans. As a number of students recounted brief stories about how we as a nation came to set aside November 11th as a day to recognize our veterans, I couldn't help thinking how important it is to keep the flame of patriotism burning brightly in the hearts of each new generation of Americans. They will be the ones who will carry on, and in some cases defend, the values that have made our nation great. The students of Alden-Hebron Elementary have a clearer understanding of the American spirit because they see it personified in Harold Myers, who not only serves as their school custodian, but because of his service to his country, is a genuine American hero.

Mr. Speaker, as a tribute to the American men and women who have served this country throughout our history and in recognition of the students of Alden-Hebron Elementary School, I submit for the RECORD statements made by a number of the students honoring our nation's veterans:

VETERANS DAY

In 1921, an American soldier—his name ''known but to God''—was buried on a Virginia hillside overlooking the Potomac River and the city of Washington. The Arlington National Cemetary burial site of the unknown World War One soldier became a place of honor to all American veterans. Similar ceremonies were held in England and France where an ''unknown soldier'' was buried in each nations place of honor.

These ceremonies all took place on November 11 to recognize the end of World War One which ended on the 11th hour of the 11th day of the 11th month in 1918. It became known as Armistice Day. Over four and a half million Americans served in the military and over 100 thousand died in battle during this war. Today, only 3,200 veterans from that conflict are alive.

On December 7, 1941 the United States entered World War Two. 16 million men and women entered the military services during this time. Four hundred six thousand Americans died fighting in World War Two. Today over 6 million veterans from that time are still living.—Crystal Stolarik

On November 11th 1947 in Birmingham, Alabama a Veterans Day parade was organized to honor all veterans. U.S. Representative Edward H. Rees of Kansas proposed changing Armistice Day to Veterans Day. In 1954 President Eisenhower signed a bill proclaiming November 11th as Veterans Day, and he called on all Americans to rededicate themselves to the cause of peace.

On May 30, 1958 two more unidentified Americans war dead were brought from overseas and buried in Arlington Cemetery beside their World War One comrade. One was killed in World War Two and one in the Korean War.

To honor these men symbolic to all Americans who Gave their lives in battle an Army honor guard, the 3rd U.S. Infantry (The Old Guard) keeps day and night watch.—Becky Peterson

VETERANS DAY

In 1968 a law passed that changed the national commemoration of Veterans Day to the fourth Monday in October. Soon it became apparent that November 11th was a matter of historic and patriotic significance to a great number of our citizens. Congress returned observance of this special day back to its traditional date in 1978.

The focal point of ceremonies conducted by the Veterans Day National Committee continues to be at the Arlington National Cemetery at the Tomb of the Unknowns. The cemetery, established in 1864 is now operated by the Department of the Army.—Brianna Borman

Tomorrow at 11 o'clock a combined color guard Representing all military services honors the unknowns by Executing ''Present Arms'' at the Tomb. The Nation's tribute to Its war dead is symbolized by the lying of a Presidential Wreath and the bugler sounding ''taps''. The sounding of ''taps'' remembers the over one million Americans killed in war and the 41 million Americans who have served in the military during times of war. They served in 11 wars from the Revolution to the Persian Gulf earning the special distinction of ''Veteran''.

Today there is, and perhaps there always will be, conflict in the world. But the United States enjoys peace and freedom.—Marty Ladafoged

HAROLD MYERS MILITARY SERVICE

Harold Myers was inducted into the U.S. Army on March 19, 1942 at Fort Benjamin Harrison, Indiana. He then went to Camp Claiborne, Louisiana to train on the 30 and 50 caliber machine guns with the 82nd Infantry Division. Training for paragliders was then given at Fort Bragg. A glider was used by towing it behind a cargo plane attached with a cable, then released when close enough to the final destination. Glider duty was extremely dangerous. The Glider which Corporal Myers flew held 4 soldiers and 1 jeep. Corporal Myers left the United States for Casablanca, Morroco on April 29, 1943. After arriving in North Africa his division traveled to Bizerte, Tunisia, a staging area for the invasion of Sicily and Italy. On Sept. 10, 1943 Corporal Myers landed at Maiori, Italy under the command of General Darby's Ranger Force.

After the Sicilian and Italian campaigns Corporal Myers division returned to Ireland of Normandy. The Germans defended against glider landings by cutting tree tops off and stringing barbed wire across them. This prevented the gliders from successfully landing. Instead of an airborne assault Corporal Myers' division landed Normandy (Omaha Beach) by LCI, an infantry landing ship, took their objective St. Mere Eglise.

On June 13, 1944 Corporal Myers' squad was providing air defense for the Division Reserve. As an American convoy passed it came under attack for a captured English Spitfire piloted by a German Officer. Corporal Myers alertly manned his machine gun and shot down the plane on its second pass saving the many soldiers under attack.

Corporal Myers and his division returned to England to ready for the invasion of Holland. On Sept. 23, 1944 Corporal Myers copiloted his glider over the English Channel and successfully landed in Holland with men and jeep intact.

On December 29, 1944, while in Belgium during the Battle of the Bulge, Corporal Myers squad came under heavy fire. 2 men under Corporal Myers' command were killed by an enemy shell which also wounded Corporal Myers and another soldier. He was taken to a field hospital and later returned to the United States. He saw 1 year, 10 months, and 13 days of overseas duty. He fought in the Sicilian, Italian, Normandy-France, and Rhineland Campaigns. His awards include the Glider Badge, Good Conduct Medal, the European-African Theater Medal with 4 stars, and the Purple Heart. Corporal Myers was honorably discharged from the United States Army on 28 Sept. 1945.—Matt Crocco and Eric Schaid

CAL STATE HAYWARD PROFESSOR JULIE GLASS IS NAMED CALIFORNIA PROFESSOR OF THE YEAR

HON. FORTNEY PETE STARK

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, November 5, 1999

Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to recognize California State University-Hayward Professor Julie Glass, who has been chosen by the Carnegie Foundation as California Professor of the Year. Dr. Glass hosts a cable television program devoted to college algebra, has authored math-oriented children's books, and is co-founder of a math and science day camp for school-age girls.

The Carnegie Foundation, a policy center devoted to strengthening America's schools and colleges, and the Council for Advancement and Support of Education (CASE) which represents 2,900 colleges, universities and independent elementary and secondary schools recently joined to select 44 state winners. Dr. Glass was selected from among 20 nominees at universities throughout California.

Among Dr. Glass' most visible contributions to Cal State-Hayward are the two programs she has developed for the university CableNet television station, which reaches 120,000 East Bay households. The first, Math on TV, was a video course that ran 2 years ago which targeted high school students preparing for mathematics placement exams.

The second program developed by Dr. Glass is College Algebra, which can be viewed on CableNet, Channel 26 in the Hayward area. The course is offered for college credit, and has an Internet component that allows students to interact with the instructor.

Among other projects, Dr. Glass has co-developed the Mathematical Explorations for Girls' Achievement Camp, a summer enrichment program to encourage girls ages 10–12 to pursue an advanced education in mathematics and science. Program participants have traveled to a wastewater treatment plant and the NASA Ames Center to learn more about career opportunities in these fields.

Dr. Glass also has several children's books with mathematical themes to her credit, and helps to train Cal State-Hayward student interns to work with students from local high schools on their math skills.

We thank Dr. Glass for all she has done to promote proficiency in mathematics and science, and for inspiring young people who would otherwise not consider a career in these fields. We are extremely fortunate for educators who encourage students to become independent thinkers, and help students build the skills they need to participate in the global, technological economy. We are very grateful for a professor who makes it her life's work to prepare our children to be productive adults. We send Julie Glass our warmest congratulations and thanks.

ESTABLISHING THE NATIONAL CENTER FOR SOCIAL WORK RESEARCH

HON. CIRO D. RODRIGUEZ

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, November 5, 1999

Mr. RODRIGUEZ. Mr. Speaker, I have introduced legislation that will provide a clearinghouse for the latest research on issues of significant social concern so that national policymakers can make informed and sound decisions. The bipartisan legislation I am introducing with Representative ASA HUTCHINSON will create a National Center for Social Work Research at the National Institutes of Health. The research conducted and supported through this Center will provide Congress, government agencies and other policymakers with empirical research on how to address social problems such as school violence, depression, mental illness, domestic violence, child abuse, teen pregnancy and a host of other challenges facing our society.

Social workers are in a unique situation to provide such valuable research. They approach both service delivery and research from an interdisciplinary, family-centered, and community-based approach. This comprehensive approach also takes into account a wide-range of social, medical, economic and community influences—information that we as policymakers need to make better informed decisions.

For example, this year Congress has struggled to develop comprehensive legislation on how to deal with the spread of school violence. Unfortunately, there is not one place we as policymakers can turn in order to receive the latest, up-to-date research on what other communities or States are doing to approach this serious issue. Through the National Center for Social Work Research, we can ensure that all research conducted on issues of serious social concern are collected and made available through one entity.

Currently, the Federal Government provides funding for various social work research activities through the NIH and other agencies. However, we currently lack coordination or direction of these activities.

I look forward to working with my colleagues on providing us with a research center that we can turn to for help on formulating policy that will improve the lives of women, children, and families in our communities. The collection of this important data will help us find solutions so that children can feel safer at school, women will no longer suffer from abuse, and communities and States will be empowered with resources on how to deal with major social issues. We owe it not only to ourselves but the women, children and families that rely on us to make informed policy decisions on a daily basis.

Mr. SHOWS. Mr. Speaker, I was away from the floor of the House on Wednesday, November 3, 1999, on official business and was unable to cast a recorded vote on rollcall 557.

CONFERENCE REPORT ON S. 900, GRAMM-LEACH-BLILEY ACT

SPEECH OF

HON. CHARLES A. GONZALEZ

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, November 4, 1999

Mr. GONZALEZ. Mr. Speaker, I rise today in support of the rule, and I would like to make a couple of comments about why I think we should support the conference report.

The future of any American business enterprise is not determined, in the final analysis, by imagination, innovation, technological advances or determination.

It succeeds only when those of us in Congress establish policies that encourage and accommodate sensible and healthy economic growth.

The conference report represents a balanced approach between the House and Senate versions of financial services modernization.

Congress has spent several decades considering many of the complicated and extremely important issues addressed in this compromise.

Failure to adopt this bill will relegate our financial industry to continue to operate under the current artificial structural limitations that place them at a competitive disadvantage in the constantly evolving international playing field.

This rule and the conference report should be adopted.

HONORING LISA FORD AND NICK WALLACE, FRIENDS, COLLEAGUES AND FELLOW TRAVELERS

HON. GEORGE RADANOVICH

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, November 5, 1999

Mr. RADANOVICH. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to celebrate the upcoming marriage of my Executive Assistant Lisa Ford and Nick Wallace. Lisa and Nick will be married in a few short weeks on November 21, 1999, in Miami, Florida.

Both Lisa and Nick go way back with me. When I was working for the Republican nomination in 1994, Lisa jointed my team to help me win the Primary. I went on to win the nomination, and the subsequent general election, and Lisa played an essential role in those victories. She has been with me through the two elections since, and she is with me still today.

Mr. Speaker. I can say without hesitation that Lisa Ford has been an integral part of my life. She has managed all facets of my political life with grace and aplomb. Lisa's calm demeanor has been, and continues to have, a tremendous influence in my office. Under fire, Lisa's clearheadedness and diligent focus is inspirational and her intelligent insight a tremendous asset. In addition, Lisa's compassion and loving nature shines through her every action and inspires respect and affection from everyone she meets. I am very fortunate to have Lisa Ford as my Executive Assistant.

At the same time that Lisa was helping me win my primary, an old friend in the District was helping me as well. The Wallace's son Nick came to Washington as an intern, and little did I know that they were falling in love! This is truly, a romance made in DC.

Nick went back to California and then returned as the star player on the Western Caucus Softball team. He continues to influence the office with his outstanding Almond Roca and his homemade sushi, as well as his wry observations on the abnormality of Washington life.

Mr. Speaker, I ask my colleagues in the House to join me in honoring the marriage of two wonderful friends. I know that Lisa Ford and Nick Wallace will prosper and be fulfilled in their dreams with their life together. I wish them all the happiness and joy that marriage can bring.

TORTURE IN TURKEY

HON. CHRISTOPHER H. SMITH

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, November 5, 1999

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, in a matter of days President Clinton and the leaders of the OSCE participating States will gather in Istanbul, Turkey for the final summit of the century. Among the important issues to be discussed will be a charter on European security. As the leaders of our countries assemble on the banks of the Bosphorus, few are likely to realize that the torturers continue to ply their trade—crushing the lives of countless men, women, and even children.

In recent days I have received disturbing reports that highlight the fact that torture continues in Turkey despite Ankara's stated zero tolerance policy. Once again, we see that those who attempt to heal the physical and emotion scars of victims of torture are themselves often victimized by the so-called ''Anti-Terror Police.'' A case in point involves Dr. Zeki Uzun, a medical professional volunteering his services to the Human Rights Foundation of Turkey's Izmir Treatment and Rehabilitation Center. Dr. Uzun was reportedly forced from his clinic by Anti-Terror Police and held for interrogation about past patients he had treated. During the interrogation, he was apparently subjected to various kinds of torture, including having a plastic bag placed over his head to stop his breathing. Dr. Uzun was held by the police for a period of six days during which time he was repeatedly abused.

In March I chaired a Helsinki Commission hearing on human rights in Turkey in anticipation of the OSCE Summit that will be held in Istanbul, November 17–18. Experts testified to the continued widespread use of torture in Turkey, including the increasing use of electric shock. The gripping testimony included the case of torture against a two-year-old child.

Mr. Speaker, I urge President Clinton to place the issue of prevention of torture at the top of his agenda when he meets with Prime Minister Ecevit and include this longstanding concerns in his address before the Turkish Grand National Assembly. If the Government of Turkey is serious about ending the practice of torture, it must publicly condemn such gross violations of human rights, adopt and implement effective procedural safeguards against torture, and vigorously prosecute those who practice torture. Instead of treating individuals like Dr. Uzun as enemies, Ankara should direct its resources to rooting out those elements of the security apparatus responsible for torture.

HONORING (COLONEL) MR. CHARLES DAVID LOCKETT ON THE OCCASION OF HIS SIXTIETH YEAR IN THE LEGAL FIELD, FOR OUTSTANDING SERVICE TO THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA AND THE STATE OF TENNESSEE, AND AS A CIVIC AND COMMUNITY LEADER

HON. BOB CLEMENT

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, November 5, 1999

Mr. CLEMENT. Mr. Speaker, I rise today in honor of Mr. Charles David Lockett of Knoxville, Tennessee, on the occasion of his sixtieth year in the legal field, for outstanding service to the United States of America and the state of Tennessee, as a respected attorney and professional, and as a community leader. Mr. Lockett's entire professional life has been dedicated to ensuring justice is served for all and that the laws of our land are honored and respected.

Charlie Lockett was born June 27, 1916 in Knox County, Tennessee. He graduated from the Knoxville School System and obtained a Doctor of Jurisprudence Degree, University of Tennessee Law School, in 1939. He began practicing law that same year when he was licensed as a Tennessee Attorney. Charlie Lockett is a member of the American Bar Association; Knoxville Bar Association; Commercial Law League of America; Association of Trial Lawyers of America; and America Judicature Society. Today he is a senior partner with the law firm of Lockett, Slovis, Rutherford and Weinstein where he continues to make valuable contributions.

I personally have known Charlie Lockett all of my life. He was a dear friend of my father, Tennessee Governor Frank G. Clement, and remains close to my family today. I, along with many others, admire many qualities about Charlie Lockett. He is a natural born leader, a likable individual, a doer, and a man who makes a difference in the lives of others.

Mr. Lockett is a distinguished veteran of World War II, where he served from 1940–1945, rising to the rank of colonel in the U.S. Army. He also served fourteen months during the Korean crisis and holds a combined military service record of thirty years regular and reserve.

Charlie Lockett married the former Helen Cole in 1939. The couple was married more than fifty years before her death, and Charlie's devotion to her was known by all. They had two daughters: Lucy Lockett Johnson (who is now deceased) and Kay Lockett, as well as grandchildren Jennifer and Bryan Johnson.

Mr. Lockett's impact on the Knoxville area has been tremendous. For Charlie Lockett has been an active member of the Knoxville Chapter of the American Red Cross since 1945, one of only two individuals to earn that distinction. He served 14 years on the University of Tennessee Board of Trustees and continues to support the institution with time, effort, and finances. He also helped lay the foundation for the Sequoia Hills Presbyterian Church where he has faithfully served since the 1940's.

Mr. Lockett's involvement in politics is legendary. He has been a member of the Democratic Party since 1936 and an invaluable source for advice and counsel to numerous Democratic politicians. He managed three successful Knox County campaigns for Governor, including those of Frank G. Clement and Buford Ellington. He was a delegate to the National Convention in 1960 and managed the Knox County campaign of the Kennedy-Johnson ticket.

Mr. Charlie Lockett has unselfishly served the citizens of Knox County and all of Tennessee for more than six decades and has worked tirelessly to improve the quality of life through membership in civic, church, professional and private organizations. His sense of duty, courage and impeccable integrity are exemplary. For these reasons I honor Mr. Charlie Lockett today. I wish him the best in all of his future endeavors. God bless him.

IN HONOR OF MARY BUSTILLO DONOHUE

HON. STEVEN R. ROTHMAN

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, November 5, 1999

Mr. ROTHMAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to join the Hispanic Bar Association of New Jersey in honoring Mary Bustillo Donohue of River Edge, New Jersey for her contributions to the Garden State. The Hispanic Bar Association will be presenting its Outstanding Service Award to Mary on November 6, 1999.

Throughout her life and career, Mary Bustillo Donohue has embodied the values of tolerance, patience, fairness, vigilance, and excellence. From working as a teacher for 26 years at Paramus Regional Catholic High School and as professor of Spanish Literature at Seton Hall for seven years, to serving on the Board of Chosen Freeholders in Bergen County, to being a dedicated member of her church, Mary has helped build a New Jersey grounded in family and community.

The residents of Bergen County and throughout New Jersey, including myself, have all benefitted from Mary's efforts on our behalf. Whether it was as a Councilwoman in her hometown of River Edge, or as a member of the Governor's Hispanic Task Force For Excellence in Education, or as the Honorary Chairman of the New Jersey State Democratic Hispanic Caucus Center for the Advancement of Women in Politics, Mary has exemplified what it means to be an active member of her community. She is a role model to us all.

On a personal level, I have been privileged to know Mary as a friend for more than 10 years, and now to be working with her as an invaluable member of my staff. Working with Mary has provided me with an even greater insight into her personal commitment to her neighbors and community. She has played an integral role in my efforts to serve all residents of the Ninth Congressional District in New Jersey and I am grateful for her outstanding work.

Mr. Speaker, there are few people more deserving of an award recognizing excellence in community service. Mary Bustillo Donohue is one of these people and I am pleased to join the Hispanic Bar Association of New Jersey in honoring her.

Mr. FARR of California. Mr. Speaker, I offer my sincerest congratulations to Mr. Arash Rassaoulpour and Miss Leila Afshar on the occasion of their marriage the Sixth of March, Nineteen Hundred and Ninety Nine at the Ritz-Carlton Hotel in McLean, Virginia.

Both were born in Tehran and immigrated to the United States in the 1970's, and they have excelled here in the United States. Arash grew up in Bethesda, Maryland, and Leila in nearby Kensington, Maryland. They have remained at the University of Maryland, College Park, where Arash is currently pursuing his Ph.D. in Pharmacology, and Leila is completing her residency in Pediatrics, after having recently earning her Medical Degree.

Arash and Leila are talented and accomplished people who are valuable members of their community. I have no doubt that they will continue their lives of achievement in their chosen fields of medicine. I am also certain that marriage will make their lives richer and more joyful. All of those who have come to know the bride's family are proud of her obtaining a medical degree and of her happy marriage. We all wish Arash and Leila happiness and success for many years to come.

CONFERENCE REPORT ON S. 900, GRAMM-LEACH-BLILEY ACT

SPEECH OF

HON. FORTNEY PETE STARK

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, November 4, 1999

Mr. STARK. Madam Speaker, I rise in opposition to the conference report on S. 900, the Financial Services Modernization Act. It is badly flawed on several counts.

Rather than strengthening the Community Reinvestment Act, the conference report actually weakens this landmark regulation. For example, the bill limits CRA's oversight of 80% of the nation's banks by decreasing the frequency of exams from once every two years to once every five years for banks with at least a ''satisfactory'' rating. This ill-advised provision will undoubtedly induce small banks to game the CRA process.

In fact, the National Community Reinvestment Coalition predicts that small banks ''will relax their CRA lending in underserved communities for four years, and then hustle to make loans in the last year before a 'twice in a decade' CRA exam.''

The overall impact of the CRA provisions, then, is to weaken protections against discrimination and redlining by constraining the Community Reinvestment Act in an era when financial conglomerates will become ever more powerful.

The Gramm-Leach-Bliley bill also raises troubling questions about the basic relationship between federal and state law in key areas. Supporters claim that the bill leaves state insurance law undisturbed. But in an October 13 letter, the National Association of Insurance Commissioners warned that the bill's broad, loose language will effectively permit banks to ''engage in high-risk reinsurance, claims settlement, credit insurance, third-party management services and other insurance business activities without being subject to supervision by either the States or the Federal government.''

NAIC's concerns focus on Section 104 of the conference report, which says that no state can ''prevent or restrict'' a bank's business activities. This language ''attacks the heart of State insurance regulation,'' NAIC writes, ''because every action taken by a State to protect consumers restricts the business activities of insurance providers—including banks—to some degree. The letter concludes with a grim prediction that ''virtually all State insurance regulatory actions affecting banks would thus be subject to legal challenge and possible preemption.''

Among the categories of state laws that may be preempted by S. 900, according to NAIC, are fair claims settlement laws covering consumers who purchase health, auto, homeowners, life, annuities, and other types of insurance.''

Concerns have also been raised about whether more protective state medical confidentiality laws are saved. Supporters say they are, but state insurance commissioners say that's not clear. Litigation is sure to follow, which will cost consumers plenty.

In addition, the bill's privacy rules governing sharing of information within affiliated entities are astonishingly weak. The bill allows affiliates—banks, securities firms and insurers—to freely share financial information without the consumer's consent. Affiliates have only to disclose their basic rules once a year.

The problems that this could create are severe. Financial institutions, looking at the bottom line, will use all of the information available to them before making lending decisions. Why, for example, would a bank that has a health insurance subsidiary not want to weigh medical information gleaned from financial data in considering mortgage applications? Will young families now have to worry that, having supplied medical information to apply for life or casualty insurance, that this data will affect their application for a home loan?

It is wrong and inappropriate for Congress to, on the one hand, enact legislation that explicitly allows mergers between banks, insurers and securities firms—but which on the other hand denies consumers any say in how their personal financial information can be used and disclosed.

I thought we learned this lesson 21 years ago, when Congress enacted the Right to Financial Privacy Act. That 1978 law, which I authored, put in place standards governing access and sharing of financial information for federal agencies. It stemmed from a Supreme Court decision that ruled the Fourth Amendment does not apply to banking records. As a former California banker, I had been a party in that 1974 suit, Calfornia Bankers Association v. Schultz.

And here we are today, throwing open the door for financial institutions to create huge new holding companies—without giving consumers any ability to say how their sensitive personal financial information can be shared. In effect, we are creating a financial privacy vacuum.

Defenders of the conference agreement say that the bill limits sharing of personal financial data with non-affiliated, third party entities. Nonsense. All that companies that don't formally affiliate have to do to escape the bill's consumer ''opt-out'' provision is enter into a joint agreement. Then, presto, they are free to manipulate personal financial data in any way they like.

Nobody likes getting annoying calls from pesky telemarketers at dinnertime. Well, once this bill passes, the telemarketing business will go through the roof. Mergers between banks, securities firms and insurers will produce data amalgamation like we've never seen before. Before long, your health insurer will be able to get information on how much money you make and what investment strategies you favor—making underwriting that much easier. Your bank will be able to easily look up how many checks you've written to your psychiatrist—and use that information to help decide whether you're an acceptable loan risk.

This is the dawning of a new Orwellian Age of Information.

I urge my colleagues to vote no on the Gramm-Leach-Bliley conference report.

COPS AND METRO ALLIANCE CELEBRATE 25 YEARS OF SUCCESSFUL POLITICAL ACTION

HON. CIRO D. RODRIGUEZ

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, November 5, 1999

Mr. RODRIGUEZ. Mr. Speaker, I am truly honored to recognize the 25th anniversary of the founding of an organization that changed the political landscape in San Antonio, across Texas and the Nation. From the alleys of San Antonio's poorest South and West Side neighborhoods, people of faith and conviction came together a quarter century ago to form Communities Organized for Public Service, or COPS.

COPS, and later its sister organization, Metro Alliance, entered the scene at a time when the largely minority, poor communities of San Antonio did not have a voice at the table. Frustrated by inaction, and worse by a lack of attention from the establishment leadership, COPS and Metro Alliance became the voice of the unheard, the mouth of those who were ignored.

COPS and Metro Alliance draw their strength from the people and institutions that make up the local neighborhoods: churches, schools, and other community-based organizations. We hear a great deal of talk today about the need for faith-based groups to take responsibility, but the truth of the matter is that COPS and Metro Alliance long ago accepted that challenge. The result has been a thousand victories, each one building on the last, with more than 50 religious congregations working together.

COPS first set out to repair the imbalance in distribution of funds for city improvements. They rightly demanded that poor neighborhoods deserved flood control and street improvements. Later COPS fought in the battle to bring single-member districts to San Antonio, helping end the legacy of a system that did not adequately seat minorities, who by this time were a majority of the local population, at the table of power.

In recent years, COPS and Metro Alliance, recognizing that education is the cornerstone of any future success, focus their energies on job training and early childhood education. Project QUEST and the San Antonio Education Partnership are models for improving the lives of communities one person at a time.

The positive impact of these organizations reaches far beyond the banks of the San Antonio River. By joining with the Industrial Areas Foundation, sister groups began to spring forth across Texas, and then other areas of the country. From city to city, the basic principles were established—that local communities could organize themselves to create a political force that could not be ignored.

Today, similar organizations exist in Dallas, El Paso, Houston, the Rio Grande Valley, and communities in New Mexico, Arizona, Louisiana, Nebraska, Iowa and Southern California. On November 7, delegates from each of these areas, some 5,000 in number, will convene in San Antonio to celebrate 25 years of successful political action on behalf of the less fortunate. Their work has improved the living and working conditions of countless thousands of low- and moderate-income families.

All my colleagues in the House of Representatives should be proud of the work performed by COPS, Metro Alliance, and their sister organizations across the country. Ordinary people doing extraordinary work is the best way to describe them. I am proud to share in their accomplishments and look forward to years of future growth and success.

ABEL PEREZ HONORED FOR ''20 DE MAYO''

HON. ILEANA ROS-LEHTINEN

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, November 5, 1999

Ms. ROS-LEHTINEN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate Mr. Abel Perez on the 30th anniversary of his newspaper, ''20 de Mayo.''

In July 1960, after being threatened by the Castro regime, Mr. Perez left Cuba with his pregnant wife in search of freedom and democracy in the United States. Later that year, Abel joined the Brigade 2506, which took part in the Bay of Pigs invasion against the communist government of Fidel Castro. After his return in 1962, they settled in California where Abel began to work for Mattel toymakers.

Aided by a small group of Cubans who were worried about communism in their homeland, the 20 de Mayo Spanish newspaper was founded on October 1969. Abel dedicated all his time to let the people in the United States know the truth about tragic events of Castro's dictatorship.

In the 1980's, Mr. Perez's community service was exemplified by helping Cuban refugees from the Mariel exodus, gathering a group of professionals in what was called the Cuban Assistance League. This organization helped the refugees to find shelter, as well as medical and financial assistance during the most critical years after their arrival in the United States.

I am proud to say that as the years passed, ''20 de Mayo'' has become one of the leading voices of freedom, democracy, and justice for all Hispanics residing in this country.

SENSE OF CONGRESS THAT SCHOOLS SHOULD USE PHONICS

SPEECH OF

HON. SHEILA JACKSON-LEE

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, November 4, 1999

Ms. JACKSON-LEE of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I rise to oppose this measure.

This resolution expresses the sense of Congress that phonemic awareness followed by direct systematic phonics instruction should be used in all schools. It further expresses the sense of Congress that phonics instruction should be an integral part of pre-service teaching requirements so that teachers will have the skills to effectively teach reading. I have concerns with this legislation on many levels.

As the Chair of the Congressional Children's Caucus, I can very much appreciate new learning tools that could benefit our children. I seems likely that phonics do have a positive impact on our children.

According to some educators, phonics-based instruction teaches learners that there is a relationship between sounds and printed letters. In order to benefit from formal reading instruction, children must have a certain level of phoneme awareness. Reading instruction in sound symbol relationships also may heighten children's awareness of language.

However, we must note that phonics alone is not the solution. Instruction in phoneme awareness and phonics is not the sole component in a program that teaches learners how to read. Rather, phonics provides a foundation of skills and strategies which can be used to quickly and efficiently decode words and build reading fluency, which is essential to reading comprehension.

Whole language, a learning tool that emphasizes reading for meaning and using literature rather than rules, has often been advocated over phonics. Schools often use a mixture of phonics and whole language.

This measure is far too limited in its scope. Phonics may be a good learning tool, but there are countless other means of learning available such as whole language. We should not limit the language of the measure to only include phonics. The schools should be free to choose their learning tools.

Choice is indeed important here, and this legislation inappropriately attempts places Federal restraints on our local schools: this measure takes away choice from our Nation's schools. Yet, it should be left to the individual schools to determine which learning tools are applied to their students. After all, who is a better judge of the needs of our children? Our teachers and school administrators or those of us here in Congress? I think that the answer is clear.

It is unfortunate that this bill was offered as a suspension. Had we been able to amend this bill, we could have ameliorated the many problems contained in its language.

MORNING HOUR DEBATES

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to the order of the House of January 19, 1999, the Chair will now recognize Members from lists submitted by the majority and minority leaders for morning hour debates. The Chair will alternate recognition between the parties, with each party limited to 30 minutes, and each Member, except the majority leader, the minority leader, or the minority whip, limited to 5 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Oregon (Mr. BLUMENAUER) for 5 minutes.

LIVABLE COMMUNITIES MOVEMENT

Mr. BLUMENAUER. Madam Speaker, last week we discussed on the floor of this Chamber the impact that the livable communities movement will have on the 1999 elections, as well as the year 2000.

It was clearly a critical factor in the elections held just last week. It was my privilege this weekend to visit with hundreds of people in New Jersey which confirmed this realization that such will be the case in the year 2000, as well.

New Jersey, Madam Speaker, is the most densely populated of our States, over 8 million people in such a tiny area. I learned that part of New Jersey in the 12th Congressional District, represented by our colleague the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. HOLT), is more densely populated than India. Yet, New Jersey is known as the Garden State. And while that may be hard for some to comprehend, it made perfect sense to me as I traveled through the beautiful New Jersey countryside.

Citizens of this State are under no illusions when it comes to the challenge they face in preserving their livability. It was my privilege to hear those challenges discussed at great length while participating in a forum sponsored by Rutgers University and The Courier Times newspaper on the future of South Jersey.

The session took place in Camden, literally in the shadows of the City of Philadelphia, and it clearly illustrated the problems and opportunities for their region. Issues of racial relations and poverty intersected with redevelopment opportunities, affordable housing with its rich history.

Several hundred citizens spent their day focusing on how to craft a vision for their community and how to implement it into action. It was truly inspirational. I look forward to following their progress in their continuing effort to shape and put in place their vision for South Jersey.

Later that day I had the opportunity to participate in a series of forums organized by our colleague the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. HOLT). Monmouth County, which is a large part of his district, will likely receive at least 10 percent of the million new people who are expected to be added to New Jersey's population over the next 20 years, over 100,000 people.

The conversation, here again, along with the depth of the commitment, was inspirational. The gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. HOLT) and his staff had organized visits with several hundred people at four different meetings. They were willing to spend a significant amount of their time on a gorgeous fall afternoon to talk indoors about the future of their communities.

People understood that it was not just enough for New Jersey to be home to the Pines Barrens and have laws on the books. There must actually be a commitment to protect and enhance the million acres of this unique treasure, which some argue is the most significant resource of its kind east of the Mississippi River.

People understood that it was not enough for New Jersey's 566 municipalities to merely be planned and zoned. Those efforts must be reinforced and related to their other partners in their region and then, in turn, harmonized with surrounding regions.

Local interests dominated by the vision of local control will fail. Local control is not meeting their needs today and will be even less effective in the future.

I carried away great optimism for the future of New Jersey, in part because of the State's bipartisan leadership:

The Republican governor, whose second inaugural theme was a livable New Jersey, has entered into an agreement with her administration and a local watchdog agency, New Jersey Future, to monitor New Jersey's executive order on sustainability. The goals and indicators are already in place with benchmarks to follow.

And with a congressional advocate like the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. HOLT), who did not just organize an impressive series of meetings, he has empaneled his own advisory committee on growth management and the environment while here in Congress he is providing leadership on livable communities.

Livability will be on the national agenda for the year 2000 election and beyond, and it is clear to me New Jersey will be helping lead that charge.

RECESS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to clause 12 of rule I, the Chair declares the House in recess until 2 p.m.

Accordingly (at 12 o'clock and 36 minutes p.m.), the House stood in recess until 2 p.m.

AFTER RECESS

The recess having expired, the House was called to order by the Speaker pro tempore (Mrs. BIGGERT) at 2 p.m.

PRAYER

The Reverend Father John Mudd, Archbishop Carroll High School, Washington, D.C., offered the following prayer:

Blessed are You, Lord God of all creation. We come before You to open this session of Congress as Your humble servants.

You are gracious and kind and merciful, and so we ask that You look on us who are Your people and answer our prayers.

Make us ever more conscious of the great blessings we share in our Nation, and help us to work together to solve the problems that threaten our well-being.

Good and gracious God, inspire our President and our leaders in Congress with a renewed vision for a better Nation and a better world where those who are weakest and the most vulnerable will be protected, and those who are strongest will act with integrity, responsibility, and generosity.

You have entrusted to us the gifts of freedom, opportunity and wealth. May we always be worthy of Your trust and use these blessings in the work for a just world where all Your children can live in peace and prosperity.

Fill us with Your spirit of wisdom and knowledge, right judgment and courage as we advance the common good, protecting human life, promoting the well-being of the family, pursuing social justice, and practicing global solidarity.

In Your holy name, we pray. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has examined the Journal of the last day's proceedings and announces to the House her approval thereof.

Pursuant to clause 1, rule I, the Journal stands approved.

PLEDGE OF ALLEGIANCE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Will the gentleman from Nevada (Mr. GIBBONS) come forward and lead the House in the Pledge of Allegiance.

Mr. GIBBONS led the Pledge of Allegiance as follows:

I pledge allegiance to the Flag of the United States of America, and to the Republic for which it stands, one nation under God, indivisible, with liberty and justice for all.

WE CAN CUT WASTE

(Mr. GIBBONS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. GIBBONS. Madam Speaker, last week, the General Accounting Office announced the results of its voluntary survey of nine, just nine Federal agencies. That survey showed that the U.S. Government lost $19.1 billion due to fraud and clerical errors last year. Let me repeat that, $19.1 billion of taxpayer money was lost simply due to government errors.

Yet, some of our colleagues on the other side of the aisle still maintain that our Federal Government cannot reduce wasteful government spending by 1 percent. Really? Well, based on these findings, common sense tells us that we can reduce wasteful spending by almost $20 billion and probably even more.

We can reduce, even eliminate, the amount wasted on costly overpayments by simply addressing the fraud and minimizing clerical errors. Wasteful spending in Washington does exist, and it needs to be stopped.

My question is this: Is it too much to expect efficiency and accountability in the Federal Government?

Madam Speaker, I yield back the billions of wasted taxpayer dollars from the hard working Americans.

NORTH KOREA IS BIGGEST RECIPIENT OF U.S. AID IN EAST ASIA

(Mr. TRAFICANT asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. TRAFICANT. Madam Speaker, the biggest recipient of American aid in East Asia is not our friends the Philippines, South Korea, or East Timor. The big bucks go to a blue brutal dictator called North Korea. Unbelievable.

North Korea got $650 million from us. Now, if that is not enough to prop up communism, not only can North Korea launch 100 missiles at America, North Korea is scheduled to get over $1 billion in aid from our taxpayers next year, $1 billion to North Korea. Beam me up. Who dreamed up this policy? Mao Zedong?

I yield back the fact that North Korea will not be building schools and hospitals, nor peace academies with our money.

LET LOCAL PEOPLE DECIDE NEEDS FOR CLASSROOMS

(Mr. BALLENGER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BALLANGER. Madam Speaker, why does the President split hairs on his 100,000 teachers? He admits we put more money into education than he does. Our money can be spent to hire teachers, to train teachers, to build classrooms and so forth. His can only hire teachers. Will they be qualified, or will they have classrooms?

California tried to cut class size and hired 30,000 teachers. But since there were few qualified persons available, they ended up with untrained teachers in crowded classrooms. Will we do the same thing? I hope not. Let us let the local people decide what their needs are.

ANNOUNCEMENT BY THE SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to clause 8 of rule XX, the Chair announces that she will postpone further proceedings today on each most motion to suspend the rules on which a recorded vote or the yeas and nays are ordered, or on which the vote is objected to under clause 6 of rule XX.

Any record votes on postponed questions will be taken after debate has concluded on all motions to suspend the rules, but not before 6 p.m. today.

MUHAMMAD ALI BOXING REFORM ACT

Mr. BLILEY. Madam Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H.R. 1832) to reform unfair and anticompetitive practices in the professional boxing industry, as amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

H.R. 1832

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the ''Muhammad Ali Boxing Reform Act''.

SEC. 2. FINDINGS.

The Congress makes the following findings:

(1) Professional boxing differs from other major, interstate professional sports industries in the United States in that it operates without any private sector association, league, or centralized industry organization to establish uniform and appropriate business practices and ethical standards. This has led to repeated occurrences of disreputable and coercive business practices in the boxing industry, to the detriment of professional boxers nationwide.

(2) State officials are the proper regulators of professional boxing events, and must protect the welfare of professional boxers and serve the public interest by closely supervising boxing activity in their jurisdiction. State boxing commissions do not currently receive adequate information to determine whether boxers competing in their jurisdiction are being subjected to contract terms and business practices which may violate State regulations, or are onerous and confiscatory.

(3) Promoters who engage in illegal, coercive, or unethical business practices can take advantage of the lack of equitable business standards in the sport by holding boxing events in States with weaker regulatory oversight.

(4) The sanctioning organizations which have proliferated in the boxing industry have not established credible and objective criteria to rate professional boxers, and operate with virtually no industry or public oversight. Their ratings are susceptible to manipulation, have deprived boxers of fair opportunities for advancement, and have undermined public confidence in the integrity of the sport.

(5) Open competition in the professional boxing industry has been significantly interfered with by restrictive and anticompetitive business practices of certain promoters and sanctioning bodies, to the detriment of the athletes and the ticket-buying public. Common practices of promoters and sanctioning organizations represent restraints of interstate trade in the United States.

(6) It is necessary and appropriate to establish national contracting reforms to protect professional boxers and prevent exploitive business practices, and to require enhanced financial disclosures to State athletic commissions to improve the public oversight of the sport.

SEC. 3. PURPOSES.

The purposes of this Act are—

(1) to protect the rights and welfare of professional boxers on an interstate basis by preventing certain exploitive, oppressive, and unethical business practices;

(2) to assist State boxing commissions in their efforts to provide more effective public oversight of the sport; and

(3) to promote honorable competition in professional boxing and enhance the overall integrity of the industry.

SEC. 4. PROTECTING BOXERS FROM EXPLOITATION.

The Professional Boxing Safety Act of 1996 (15 U.S.C. 6301 et seq.) is amended—

(1) by redesignating sections 9 through 15 as sections 17 through 23, respectively; and

(2) by inserting after section 8 the following new sections:

''SEC. 9. CONTRACT REQUIREMENTS.

''Within 2 years after the date of the enactment of the Muhammad Ali Boxing Reform Act, the Association of Boxing Commissions shall develop and shall approve by a vote of no less than a majority of its member State boxing commissioners, guidelines for minimum contractual provisions that should be included in bout agreements and boxing contracts. It is the sense of Congress that State boxing commissions should follow these ABC guidelines.

''SEC. 10. PROTECTION FROM COERCIVE CONTRACTS.

''(a) GENERAL RULE.—

''(1)(A) A contract provision shall be considered to be in restraint of trade, contrary to public policy, and unenforceable against any boxer to the extent that it—

''(i) is a coercive provision described in subparagraph (B) and is for a period greater than 12 months; or

''(ii) is a coercive provision described in subparagraph (B) and the other boxer under contract to the promoter came under that contract pursuant to a coercive provision described in subparagraph (B).

''(B) A coercive provision described in this subparagraph is a contract provision that grants any rights between a boxer and a promoter, or between promoters with respect to a boxer, if the boxer is required to grant such rights, or a boxer's promoter is required to grant such rights with respect to a boxer to another promoter, as a condition precedent to the boxer's participation in a professional boxing match against another boxer who is under contract to the promoter.

''(2) This subsection shall only apply to contracts entered into after the date of the enactment of the Muhammad Ali Boxing Reform Act.

''(3) No subsequent contract provision extending any rights or compensation covered in paragraph (1) shall be enforceable against a boxer if the effective date of the contract containing such provision is earlier than 3 months before the expiration of the relevant time period set forth in paragraph (1).

''(b) PROMOTIONAL RIGHTS UNDER MANDATORY BOUT CONTRACTS.—No boxing service provider may require a boxer to grant any future promotional rights as a requirement of competing in a professional boxing match that is a mandatory bout under the rules of a sanctioning organization.

''SEC. 11. SANCTIONING ORGANIZATIONS.

''(a) OBJECTIVE CRITERIA.—Within 2 years after the date of the enactment of the Muhammad Ali Boxing Reform Act, the Association of Boxing Commissions shall develop and shall approve by a vote of no less than a majority of its member State boxing commissioners, guidelines for objective and consistent written criteria for the ratings of professional boxers. It is the sense of Congress that sanctioning bodies and State boxing commissions should follow these ABC guidelines.

''(b) APPEALS PROCESS.—A sanctioning organization shall not be entitled to receive any compensation, directly or indirectly, in connection with a boxing match, until it provides the boxers with notice that the sanctioning organization shall, within 7 days after receiving a request from a boxer questioning that organization's rating of the boxer—

''(1) provide to the boxer a written explanation of the organization's criteria, its rating of the boxer, and the rationale or basis for its rating (including a response to any specific questions submitted by the boxer); and

''(2) submit a copy of its explanation to the Association of Boxing Commissions.

''(c) NOTIFICATION OF CHANGE IN RATING.—A sanctioning organization shall not be entitled to receive any compensation, directly or indirectly, in connection with a boxing match, until, with respect to a change in the rating of a boxer previously rated by such organization in the top 10 boxers, the organization—

''(1) posts a copy, within 7 days of such change, on its Internet website or home page, if any, including an explanation of such change, for a period of not less than 30 days; and

''(2) provides a copy of the rating change and explanation to an association to which at least a majority of the State boxing commissions belong.

''(d) PUBLIC DISCLOSURE.—

''(1) FTC FILING.—A sanctioning organization shall not be entitled to receive any compensation directly or indirectly in connection with a boxing match unless, not later than January 31 of each year, it submits to the Federal Trade Commission and to the ABC—

''(A) a complete description of the organization's ratings criteria, policies, and general sanctioning fee schedule;

''(B) the bylaws of the organization;

''(C) the appeals procedure of the organization for a boxer's rating; and

''(D) a list and business address of the organization's officials who vote on the ratings of boxers.

''(2) FORMAT; UPDATES.—A sanctioning organization shall—

''(A) provide the information required under paragraph (1) in writing, and, for any document greater than 2 pages in length, also in electronic form; and

''(B) promptly notify the Federal Trade Commission of any material change in the information submitted.

''(3) FTC TO MAKE INFORMATION AVAILABLE TO PUBLIC.—The Federal Trade Commission shall make information received under this subsection available to the public. The Commission may assess sanctioning organizations a fee to offset the costs it incurs in processing the information and making it available to the public.

''(4) INTERNET ALTERNATIVE.—In lieu of submitting the information required by paragraph (1) to the Federal Trade Commission, a sanctioning organization may provide the information to the public by maintaining a website on the Internet that—

''(A) is readily accessible by the general public using generally available search engines and does not require a password or payment of a fee for full access to all the information;

''(B) contains all the information required to be submitted to the Federal Trade Commission by paragraph (1) in an easy to search and use format; and

''(C) is updated whenever there is a material change in the information.

''SEC. 12. REQUIRED DISCLOSURES TO STATE BOXING COMMISSIONS BY SANCTIONING ORGANIZATIONS.

''A sanctioning organization shall not be entitled to receive any compensation directly or indirectly in connection with a boxing match until it provides to the boxing commission responsible for regulating the match in a State a statement of—

''(1) all charges, fees, and costs the organization will assess any boxer participating in that match;

''(2) all payments, benefits, complimentary benefits, and fees the organization will receive for its affiliation with the event, from the promoter, host of the event, and all other sources; and

''(3) such additional information as the commission may require.

''SEC. 13. REQUIRED DISCLOSURES FOR PROMOTERS.

''(a) DISCLOSURES TO THE BOXING COMMISSIONS.—A promoter shall not be entitled to receive any compensation directly or indirectly in connection with a boxing match until it provides to the boxing commission responsible for regulating the match in a State a statement of—

''(1) a copy of any agreement in writing to which the promoter is a party with any boxer participating in the match;

''(2) a statement made under penalty of perjury that there are no other agreements, written or oral, between the promoter and the boxer with respect to that match; and

''(3)(A) all fees, charges, and expenses that will be assessed by or through the promoter on the boxer pertaining to the event, including any portion of the boxer's purse that the promoter will receive, and training expenses;

''(B) all payments, gifts, or benefits the promoter is providing to any sanctioning organization affiliated with the event; and

''(C) any reduction in a boxer's purse contrary to a previous agreement between the promoter and the boxer or a purse bid held for the event.

''(b) DISCLOSURES TO THE BOXER.—A promoter shall not be entitled to receive any compensation directly or indirectly in connection with a boxing match until it provides to the boxer it promotes—

''(1) the amounts of any compensation or consideration that a promoter has contracted to receive from such match;

''(2) all fees, charges, and expenses that will be assessed by or through the promoter on the boxer pertaining to the event, including any portion of the boxer's purse that the promoter will receive, and training expenses; and

''(3) any reduction in a boxer's purse contrary to a previous agreement between the promoter and the boxer or a purse bid held for the event.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to the rule, the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. BLILEY) and the gentlewoman from Colorado (Ms. DEGETTE) each will control 20 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. BLILEY).

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. BLILEY. Madam Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days within which to revise and extend their remarks on H.R. 1832, and to insert extraneous material on the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLILEY. Madam Speaker, I yield myself 5 minutes.

Madam Speaker, earlier this year, 19 bipartisan State attorneys general and numerous State boxing commissioners from across the United States asked Congress for help in cleaning up the sport of boxing. These State agencies strongly endorsed the Muhammad Ali Act, saying it was necessary legislation to prevent exploitation of professional boxers and to curb the anticompetitive and fraudulent business practices in the sport. Congress is now giving the States and State boxing commissioners their requested assistance.

In 1996, the Committee on Commerce passed legislation establishing a uniform, nationwide system of licensing and minimum health and safety standards for boxers. This Act was a resounding success. Because of our bill, for the first time, States could keep track of and protect professional boxers with appropriate oversight and supervision. For example, when boxer Mike Tyson committed the barbaric act of biting off a portion of Evander Holyfield's ear 2 years ago, Tyson's suspension from boxing was swift and nationwide.

While the 1996 bill has been a resounding success, it was only an important first step of cleaning up the sport of boxing. Two weeks ago, the Miami Herald reported that over 30 prizefights have been fixed or tainted in the last 12 years.

Just last Thursday, a Federal grand jury issued a 32-count indictment against the president and three officials of the International Boxing Federation on charges of taking bribes from promoters and managers to manipulate rankings, as well as racketeering and money laundering. According to the Federal prosecutor, ''In the IBF, rankings were bought, not earned, completely corrupting the ranking system.''

The Muhammad Ali Boxing Reform Act would put an end to this corruption. It requires the establishment of objective and consistent criteria for the ratings of professional boxers. It requires disclosures of compensation received in connection with a boxing match by promoters, managers, sanctioning bodies, and judges and referees. It provides for tough new penalties for criminals who continue to try to manipulate and undermine the sport through coercion and bribes.

According to Boxing News, ''The Ali Act, if enacted, would greatly clean up boxing in America.'' Ring Magazine calls this ''well thought out'' legislation that ''will be a huge step toward getting rid of the bandits and parasites in the sport.'' ESPN says that ''The Ali Act, modest in scope, can make a difference. It is a small, but significant step, and one that would cost nothing to taxpayers.''

I congratulate the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. OXLEY), the chairman of the Subcommittee on Finance and Hazardous Materials, for his leadership in moving this bill forward, and I look forward to restoring honesty and integrity to this great sport.

Also, before closing, I want to acknowledge the support and assistance from the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. GOODLING), the chairman of the Committee on Education and the Workforce.

Madam Speaker, I urge all my colleagues to support this important measure.

Madam Speaker, I include the following letters for the RECORD, as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, COMMITTEE ON EDUCATION AND THE WORKFORCE,
Washington, DC, November 1, 1999.

Hon. TOM BLILEY,
Chairman, Committee on Commerce, House of Representatives, Washington, DC.

DEAR CHAIRMAN BLILEY: I am writing regarding H.R. 1832, the Muhammad Ali Boxing Reform Act, which is within the jurisdiction of the Committee on Commerce and in addition the Committee on Education and the Workforce. The bill amends the Professional Boxing Safety Act. I have no objection to this bill being scheduled under suspension of the House Rules. The Committee on Commerce ordered the bill favorably reported on September 29, 1999.

Given the impending adjournment and since I support the reported bill, I do not intend to call a full Committee meeting to consider this bill; however, the Committee does hold an interest in preserving its jurisdiction with respect to issues raised in the bill and its jurisdictional prerogatives in future legislation. As such, Members of the Education and the Workforce would expect to be represented should the provisions of this bill be considered in a conference with the Senate.

I would appreciate the inclusion of this letter in the Report you file to accompany this bill. I thank you for your attention to this matter and look forward to swift passage of H.R. 1832.

Sincerely,

BILL GOODLING,
Chairman.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
COMMITTEE ON COMMERCE,
Washington, DC, November 2, 1999.

Hon. WILLIAM F. GOODLING,
Chairman, Committee on Education and the Workforce, House of Representatives, Washington, DC.

DEAR BILL: Thank you for your letter regarding your Committee's jurisdictional interest in H.R. 1832, the Muhammad Ali Boxing Reform Act.

In the past, our committees have worked cooperatively in the enactment of the Professional Boxing Safety Act, and I acknowledge your role as an additional committee of jurisdiction. I appreciate your cooperation in moving the bill to the House floor expeditiously and agree that your decision to forgo further action on the bill will not prejudice the Committee on Education and the Workforce with respect to its jurisdictional prerogatives on this or similar legislation. Further, I will support your request for conferees should this bill be the subject of a House-Senate conference. I will also insert a copy of your letter and this response in the Committee's report on the bill and the Congressional Record when H.R. 1832 is considered by the House.

Thank you again for your cooperation.

Sincerely,

TOM BLILEY,
Chairman.

Madam Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Ms. DEGETTE. Madam Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Madam Speaker, I rise in strong support of H.R. 1832, the Muhammad Ali Boxing Reform Act.

For many years, there has been widespread concern, as the gentleman from Virginia (Chairman BLILEY) stated, about the boxing industry in the United States. Not only have scandals plagued the industry as long as I can remember, but fighters have been taken advantage of financially, and opportunities to compete for a title have not always been awarded to legitimate contenders.

As my colleagues know, Madam Speaker, almost every other major sport in the United States operates with a central body to establish appropriate business standards and effective mechanisms of self-regulation. But not boxing. Boxing exists in a world of alphabet soup organizations whose rating methodologies are as visceral as the famous Ali mirage and promoters who are as untouchable as Ali was behind the ''rope-a-dope.''

The purpose of the Muhammad Ali Boxing Reform Act is to increase disclosure and prevent abuses in professional boxing, specifically targeting conflicts of interest that arise for promotors.

H.R. 1832 limits contracts between boxers and promotors, ending the coercive practice of requiring long contracts for fighters to obtain particular bouts.

The bill also seeks to ensure that the manager is an independent applicant of the boxer, not an agent serving the financial interests of the promoter.

Furthermore, the sanctioning organizations would have to establish objective criteria for the rating of professional boxers and to fully disclosure their bylaws, rating systems, and officials.

I firmly believe that, with these limitations, the boxing industry can take a giant step toward the 21st century and the ending of corruption.

I would like to thank the gentleman from Virginia (Chairman BLILEY) and especially the gentleman from Ohio (Chairman OXLEY) for his hard work on this legislation. Much credit is also due to Senator JOHN MCCAIN, who is the author of the Senate approved version of this bill.

In the end, the Muhammad Ali Boxing Reform Act puts abuse in the boxing industry on the ropes. By passing this important legislation, I believe that Congress will deliver the final one-two punch to boxing corruption.

Madam Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

□ 1415

Mr. BLILEY. Madam Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. OXLEY), the chairman of the subcommittee.

Mr. OXLEY. Madam Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding me this time.

Last Thursday, the President and three other officials from the IBF, the International Boxing Federation, were indicted. They were brought under criminal charges for operating IBF's sanctioning body as a racketeering enterprise in which fighters' rankings were routinely altered in exchange for hundreds of thousands of dollars in illicit bribes from promoters and managers. This scandal follows on the heels of an investigation by the Miami Herald revealing more than 30 fights in the past 12 years have been fixed or tainted, including at least one heavyweight championship match.

Madam Speaker, I have with me a copy of the Miami Herald, Sunday, October 31, which is titled ''Fixed Fights, Down for the Count,'' in which the columnist, Ken Rodriguez of the Miami Herald, chronicles just how bad the situation is in boxing and how badly it needs cleaning up. And I want to cite that as an example of what we can do, working with the media, to uncover this kind of activity.

In 1996, I sponsored a bipartisan boxing reform bill which prohibited conflicts of interest for State boxing commission employees. It also established the first-ever uniformed licensing and health and safety system to protect professional boxers. This legislation was a great success and the State boxing commissions and attorneys general now have asked us to go one step further to clean up the corruption among boxing promoters, managers, and sanctioning bodies.

H.R. 1832, the Muhammad Ali Boxing Reform Act, is based on the numerous bipartisan hearings this committee has held over the past 2 decades on the need to reform the boxing industry. On June 29, 1999, our committee held a hearing, just after the controversial decision in the Holyfield-Lewis heavyweight championship fight, in which an IBF judge awarded the title to Mr. Holyfield, the IBF champion, instead of to Mr. Lewis, the WBC champion and clear apparent winner, according to some boxing commentators. In the words of one hearing witness, the decision was ''highly influenced.'' Another witness said bluntly, ''Lewis was robbed.''

H.R. 1832 expands on our initial success with boxing reform, extending the conflict-of-interest prohibitions in the 1996 act to apply to other boxing entities besides State commissions. Specifically, H.R. 1832 would enact seven critical reforms:

First, bribes are prohibited for sanctioning bodies. Two, conflicts of interest are prohibited for boxing managers and promoters. Three, boxers are protected from coercive contracts. Four, new strong disclosure requirements are created for promoters, sanctioning bodies, judges, and referees to reduce corruption. Fifth, boxing judges and referees are required to be approved by the State commissions. Sixth, unsportsmanlike conduct would be added as a new category of suspendable offenses. And, seven, the State boxing commissions are encouraged to adopt uniform rules, regulations, rating criteria, and guidelines for contracts.

These are important reforms which, according to the Congressional Budget Office, would have no significant impact on the Federal budget and would not result in any significant cost to the States. This legislation passed the Senate earlier this year. It passed our committee by a bipartisan voice vote, and has received support from the president of the Association of Boxing Commissions, International Boxing Digest, Boxing News, the editor of Ring Magazine, the World Boxing Council, and numerous promoters, managers, and boxers.

In the words of one of boxing's greatest, Muhammad Ali, ''The day this bill is signed into law cannot be soon enough. I pray justice will be done and somehow, along the way, honor can be restored to this sport.''

Madam Speaker, I provide for inclusion in the RECORD two letters from Muhammad Ali in support of this legislation, the most recent dated November 8, today, as well as a letter from the National Association of Attorneys General in support of this legislation.

NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF ATTORNEYS GENERAL,
Washington, DC, April 28, 1999.

Hon. JOHN MCCAIN,
U.S. Senate, Chairman, Senate Commerce, Science, and Transportation Committee, Washington, DC.

Hon. THOMAS BLILEY,
House of Representatives, Chairman, Commerce Committee, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR MCCAIN AND REPRESENTATIVE BLILEY: We, the leadership of the National Association of Attorneys General (''NAAG'') Boxing Task Force, and Attorneys General interested in industry reform, strongly endorse the Muhammad Ali Boxing Reform Act (S. 305) and fully support your efforts to improve the professional boxing industry. We believe this legislation will curb anti-competitive and fraudulent business practices and prevent blatant exploitation of professional boxers.

We are encouraged by the support S. 305 has received in the Senate, and we look forward to working with you to protect the health and safety of professional boxers and to prevent exploitation, fraud, and restraints of trade. The Muhammad Ali Act provides a practical approach to long-standing problems of fraud and restraints of trade in this industry.

The Boxing Task Force, currently comprised of 19 Attorneys General, was formally established in March 1998 after legislation was passed by both the House and Senate Commerce Committees and then subsequently by both the House and Senate. (The Professional Boxing Safety Act 15 U.S.C. §6301, et seq.). After Federal Trade Commission Chairman Robert Pitofsky's suggested that state Attorneys General review business practices in the professional boxing industry, the National Association of Attorneys General created the Boxing Task Force to examine interstate boxing practices in the United States, identify the problems therein, and recommend ways to improve the industry.

In furtherance of our common objectives, the Task Force conducted a public hearing on January 19–21, 1999, where testimony, including numerous recommendations, was received from individuals representing a cross-section of the boxing industry. Testimony was elicited from boxing promoters on their role in the industry and on the issue of long term and exclusive contractual options. Sanctioning organizations testified about the methods utilized to rank fighters. Various experts on boxers' injuries discussed the necessity for medical clearance and the use of proper equipment and ringside safety precautions. Industry members and business leaders discussed a structured annuity and pension plan for professional boxers.

We are in the process of reviewing the testimony, and after further consultation with members of the industry, we will compile a report with our recommendations. We seek to reform certain practices within the industry, to return integrity to boxing on behalf of the athletes and the ticket-buying public, and to otherwise enhance the well-being of boxing and all associated with it.

Finally, we would like to emphasize the importance of the proposed enforcement guidelines of the Muhammad Ali Boxing Reform Act, which would permit a State, as parens patriae, to being a civil action on behalf of its residents in an appropriate district court of the United States for violations of the Boxing Reform Act. We believe that the authority to enjoin the holding of a professional boxing match, and to enforce compliance with the Muhammad Ali Boxing Reform Act, is necessary to ensure lawful and responsible boxing industry compliance with national reforms.

Thank you for your consideration of our views. We hope you will favorably consider the Muhammad Ali Act. We stand ready to assist you as the bill advances, so please feel free to call on us.

Sincerely yours,

Eliot Spitzer, Attorney General of New York, Chair, NAAG Boxing Task Force; Jim Ryan, Attorney General of Illinois, Vice Chair, NAAG Boxing Task Force; Janet Napolitano, Attorney General of Arizona; Richard Blumenthal, Attorney General of Connecticut; Bill Lockyer, Attorney General of California; Robert A. Butterworth, Attorney General of Florida; Jeffrey A. Modisett, Attorney General of Indiana; Tom Miller, Attorney General of Iowa; Richard P. Ieyoub, Attorney General of Louisiana; J. Joseph Curran, Jr., Attorney General of Maryland; Mike Moore, Attorney General of Mississippi; Jeremiah W. ''Jay'' Nixon, Attorney General of Missouri; Frankie Sue Del Papa, Attorney General of Nevada; Peter Verniero, Attorney General of New Jersey; W.A. Drew Edmondson, Attorney General of Oklahoma; Hardy Myers, Attorney General of Oregon; Mike Fisher, Attorney General of Pennsylvania; José A. Fuentes-Agostini, Attorney General of Puerto Rico; Mark L. Earley, Attorney General of Virginia.

GREATEST OF ALL TIME, INC.,
Berrien Springs, MI, November 8, 1999.

Hon. MICHAEL OXLEY,
Hon. ELIOT ENGEL,
House of Representatives,
Washington, DC.

DEAR REPRESENTATIVES OXLEY AND ENGEL: We are pleased that ''The Muhammad Ali Boxing Reform Act'' (H.R. 1832) is being brought up before the full House of Representatives. We strongly support this bill which will protect boxers from exploitations and unfair treatment by unscrupulous promoters and other business interests that dominate this troubled industry. We urge all members of Congress to support this effort to make boxing a more honorable sport.

Most sincerely,

MUHAMMAD ALI.
LONNIE ALI.
MUHAMMAD ALI,
Berrien Springs, MI, June 30, 1998.

Senator JOHN MCCAIN,
Russell Senate Office Building,
Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR MCCAIN: Thank you for all of your effort in setting up guidelines for boxers in the ring today and for those in the future. I can't begin to express how honored I am that you would name the Boxing Reform Act after me.

After reading the summary you sent me, I can only tell you that these guidelines are long overdue. I only wish they would have been in effect when I was boxing.

Thank you for caring enough about the sport of boxing that you would help those in the ring today and in the future.

Sincerely,

MUHAMMAD ALI.

Mr. BLILEY. Madam Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. TAUZIN).

Mr. TAUZIN. Madam Speaker, during our subcommittee markup on this bill earlier this year, we asked a panel of witnesses about the judging of the Holyfield-Lewis championship unification fight that had just occurred. Two said the scoring was incompetent, two indicated that it was dishonest, and the last said Lewis was robbed. Well, we all are robbed when one of our national sports becomes tainted in such a way.

I grew up watching boxing as a child with my grandfather and my dad in the little community of Chackbay, Louisiana. I have heard of too many young fighters who have put so much into training themselves for a big fight only to suffer from what Muhammad Ali has called the ''dishonest ways'' of promoters.

This bill protects boxers from dishonest promoters. It prohibits coercive contracts and empowers the States to develop uniform rules and regulations governing the sport. It requires the sanctioning bodies, the referees, judges, and promoters to disclose any conflicts of interest and sources of compensation to help the States enforce their laws and protect boxers from any taint of corruption.

I want to note, as my good friend, the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. OXLEY), has done, that this legislation has the support of the president of the Association of Boxing Commissioners, Ring Magazine, International Boxing Digest, Boxing News, numerous promoters, managers, and boxers, all of who want to clean up this sport and indeed restore it to its former glory.

Last June, when we began our work in the subcommittee, we indeed promised that we would bring this reform bill to the floor of the House. I am very happy that the Committee on Commerce, with the help of the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. BLILEY) and the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. OXLEY), kept that promise and we have now delivered this bill to the floor of the House.

I also want to thank the gentleman from New York (Mr. ENGEL) for working so closely with the gentleman from Ohio on this legislation, and, of course, the chairman and ranking member of our full Committee on Commerce for moving this bill forward. This is long overdue, and those who love the sport of boxing, as I do, and so many do in my district and across America, will hail this day as a very important day in restoring the dignity and the glory of the sport of boxing in America.

Ms. DEGETTE. Madam Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume in closing to acknowledge that my colleagues on the other side of the aisle did note that I am not the gentleman from New York (Mr. ENGEL), who has worked very hard on this bill.

I too would like to commend him. He is sorry he could not be here to manage the time today, but he had a family emergency and I am filling in.

This is an excellent bill, and I commend particularly the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. OXLEY) and the gentleman from New York (Mr. ENGEL).

Mr. ENGEL. Madam Speaker, I rise in strong support of H.R. 1832, the Muhammad Ali Boxing Reform Act.

For years, there has been widespread concern about the boxing industry in the United States. Not only have scandals plagued the industry as long as I can remember, but fighters have been taken advantage of financially and opportunities to compete for a title have not always been awarded to legitimate contenders.

As you know, Madam Speaker, almost every other major sport in the United States operates with a central body to establish appropriate business standards and effective mechanisms of self-regulation. Not boxing. Boxing exists in a world of alphabet soup organizations whose rating methodologies are as ephemeral as the famous Ali ''mirage'' and promoters who are as untouchable as Ali was behind the ''rope-a-dope.''

The purpose of the Muhammad Ali Boxing Reform Act is to increase disclosure and prevent abuses in professional boxing, specifically targeting conflicts of interest that arise for promoters.

H.R. 1832 limits contracts between boxers and promoters, ending the coercive practice of requiring long contracts for fighters to obtain particular bouts.

The bill also seeks to ensure that the manager is an independent advocate of the boxer, not an agent serving the financial interest of the promoter.

Furthermore, the sanctioning organizations would have to establish objective criteria for the rating of professional boxers and fully disclose their by-laws, rating systems, and officials.

I firmly believe that with these limitations, the boxing industry can take a giant step toward the 21st century and the ending of corruption.

I would like to thank my good friend, Chairman OXLEY, for his hard work on this legislation. It has been my pleasure to serve as the lead Democratic cosponsor of his bill in the House and to cosign several dear colleagues with him.

Much credit is also due to Senator JOHN MCCAIN, author of the Senator-approved version of the bill. I would also like to call attention to Eliot Spitzer, the Attorney General of the State of New York, for his efforts to root out corruption in the boxing industry. As Chairman of the National Association of Attorneys General Boxing Task Force, Eliot Spitzer has helped guide Congress through the legal technicalities required for effective enforcement of new boxing regulations. His contribution and testimony before Congress will not be forgotten.

In the end, the Muhammad Ali Boxing Reform Act puts abuse in the boxing industry on the ropes. By passing this important legislation, I believe that Congress will deliver the final one, two punch to boxing corruption.

Ms. DEGETTE. Madam Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. BLILEY. Madam Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mrs. BIGGERT). The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. BLILEY) that the House suspend the rules and pass the bill, H.R. 1832 , as amended.

The question was taken; and (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the bill, as amended, was passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

RECOGNIZING GENEROUS CONTRIBUTION BY LIVING PERSONS WHO HAVE DONATED A KIDNEY TO SAVE A LIFE

Mr. BLILEY. Madam Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and agree to the resolution (H. Res. 94) recognizing the generous contribution made by each living person who has donated a kidney to save a life.

The Clerk read as follows:

H. RES. 94

Whereas kidneys are vital organs that clean the blood by removing wastes, and failed kidneys have lost the ability to remove these wastes;

Whereas in the United States more than 250,000 patients with kidney failure, also known as end stage renal disease (ESRD), have died since 1989;

Whereas during 1996, 283,932 patients were in treatment for ESRD, and an additional 73,091 patients began treatment for ESRD;

Whereas the most common cause of ESRD has consistently been diabetes, because the high levels of blood sugar in persons with diabetes cause the kidneys to filter too much blood and leave the kidneys, over time, unable to filter waste products;

Whereas of the patients who began treatment for ESRD in 1996, 43 percent were persons with diabetes;

Whereas ESRD can be treated with dialysis, which artificially cleans the blood but which imposes significant burdens on quality of life, or with a successful kidney transplant operation, which frees the patient from dialysis and brings about a dramatic improvement in quality of life;

Whereas in 1996 the number of kidneys transplanted in the United States was 12,238, with 25 percent of the kidneys donated from biologically related living relatives, 5 percent from spousal or other biologically unrelated living persons, and the remainder from cadavers;

Whereas from 1988 to 1997, the number of patients on the waiting list for a cadaveric kidney transplant increased more than 150 percent, from 13,943 to more than 35,000;

Whereas the annual number of cadaveric kidneys available for transplant has increased only slightly, from 8,327 in 1994 to 8,526 in 1996, an increase of less than 100 such kidneys per year;

Whereas from 1988 to 1997, the annual number of kidneys donated by living persons rose 104 percent, from 1,812 to 3,705; and

Whereas in 1995, the 3-year survival rate for kidney recipients was 82 percent if the donor was a living parent, 85 percent if the donor was a living spouse, 81 percent if the donor was a biologically unrelated living person other than a spouse, and 70 percent if the kidney was cadaveric: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the House of Representatives—

(1) recognizes the generous contribution made by each living person who has donated a kidney to save a life; and

(2) acknowledges the advances in medical technology that have enabled living kidney transplantation to become a viable treatment option for an increasing number of patients with end stage renal disease.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to the rule, the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. BLILEY) and the gentlewoman from Colorado (Ms. DEGETTE) each will control 20 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. BLILEY).

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. BLILEY. Madam Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days within which to revise and extend their remarks on House Resolution 94, and to insert extraneous material.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLILEY. Madam Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume, and I rise in support of H. Res. 94, a resolution recognizing the generous contribution made by each living person who has donated a kidney to save the life of another person.

Americans who donate their organs to save another's life are heroes, and I am delighted that the House of Representatives has taken the time to recognize them as such. From 1998 to 1997, the annual number of kidneys donated by living persons rose 104 percent, from 1,812 to 3,705. Even so, the number of people on dialysis while they wait for a kidney transplant has grown to some 35,000. We have to do more.

The Committee on Commerce has spent a great deal of time and effort in the last year working to develop good solutions to the difficult problem of increasing the supplies of donated organs while safeguarding the system from unintended bureaucratic interference that would dramatically harm efforts to increase donations. Many of those ideas are embodied in H.R. 2418, the Organ Procurement and Transplant Patient Network Amendments of 1999, which was reported out of my committee just 3 weeks ago.

Among the initiatives in H.R. 2418 is a program to provide living and travel expenses for those individuals who donate an organ to a person requiring a transplant in another State. The committee found that there may be many willing donors who would like to save the life of another American but find themselves in financial circumstances that would make it impossible for them to take a leave of absence from their job. H.R. 2418 would ease that burden.

I am also proud to say that due to the Committee on Commerce efforts, H.R. 3075, the Medicare, Medicaid and S–CHIP Balance Budget Refinement Act of 1999, added $200 million to pay for additional immunosuppressive drug therapy. Medicare presently only covers these drugs for 36 months. This bill takes a first step at addressing that issue and allows us to provide more coverage for needy organ transplant patients. Access to these drugs can literally make the difference between life and death.

While we in Congress continue to do what we can to safeguard the organ allocation system from bureaucratic interference, and work to address financial problems donors face as well as those recipients who needs affordable immunosuppressive drug therapy, let us remember the role that the thousands of ordinary Americans have played in the lives of their neighbors and families who have donated kidneys. We salute you for your sacrifice and your charity.

Madam Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Ms. DEGETTE. Madam Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

First of all, I again want to thank my chairman, the esteemed gentleman from Virginia, for bringing this bill up, and I also want to thank my colleague, the gentleman from Washington (Mr. NETHERCUTT), for the opportunity to recognize those individuals who are willing to make a living donation of one of their kidneys. The gentleman from Washington and I are cochairs of the Congressional Diabetes Caucus, and both of us recognize that for those who care about that particular issue, kidney disease and kidney donation is a critical and important issue for us to be discussing today.

Those who donate kidneys are courageous individuals who give selflessly of themselves, literally, to save another person's life. Last year, more than 4,000 living donors gave kidneys. That was 31 percent of the transplants. Over a 10-year period, the number of kidney donations has increased by 54 percent, from 5,688 in 1988 to 8,774 in 1997. The increase in the number of living kidney donors has been even more dramatic, from 1,812 to 3,695, a doubling of living donors to relatives that received this critical gift of life.

Every year thousands of lives are saved when a family member, a friend, a coworker, or even a member of the community they do not know makes the choice to donate one of their two kidneys to someone in need. With the need for organ transplants far outpacing the supply, we are also starting to see a new type of donation, a nondirected donation, where an individual makes a choice to donate a kidney to any patient who needs it.

An outstanding example of a nondirected live kidney donation is Joyce Roush. In September of this year, she used the donation of her kidney to a stranger as an opportunity to bring the public's attention to the possibility of making nondirected donations.

Most of us are also aware of the case where Sean Elliott, of the world champion San Antonio Spurs, needed a kidney transplant and received one from his older brother Noel Elliott.

According to Elliott, he would like to return to playing in the NBA this year if possible. Elliott said, ''It's another obstacle I have a chance to topple.''

He has also overcome two knee surgeries. ''It would be a pretty awesome accomplishment,'' he said, ''and a great statement for anyone who faces adversity. It would be inspirational to a lot of people.''

While that certainly would be a tremendous inspiration to many people across the country, the example of his older brother Noel and individuals like Joyce Roush should also be an inspiration and an example for people across the country.

Unfortunately, while there has been a substantial increase in organ donations over the past decade, almost 350,000 Americans still have lost their lives to kidney failure. Moreover, the number of patients on the waiting list for a kidney transplant has increased by 174 percent, from 13,943 in 1988 to 38,270 in 1997.

The number of cadaveric kidney transplants is stagnant, so the fact that we are seeing this increase in living donors in recent years is good news to the many who suffer from kidney failure. We can perform more living donor transplants without either putting the donor or recipient in undue danger because of medical advances.

In 1995, a new type of procedure was developed that made a kidney transplant a great deal less intrusive and thus reduced the risk to the donor and cut down on the amount of recovery time.

Madam Speaker, as co-chair of the Congressional Diabetes Caucus, the gentleman from Washington (Mr. NETHERCUTT) and I have over 240 Members of the House who have signed on as members of this caucus.

We know that the most common cause of end stage renal disease has consistently been diabetes. In fact, 35 percent of the new cases of kidney failure every year and 25 percent of all cases of kidney failure come from diabetic causes. This is true because of the high levels of blood sugar people with diabetes have that cause the kidneys to filter too much blood and leave the kidneys over time unable to filter waste products.

Of those beginning ESRD treatment in 1997, just under half are people with diabetes. This is why it is so important every day that relatives, friends, and co-workers and members of the community donate kidneys both to those that they know and those they do not know.

I hope we can find ways before we cure diabetes, which is our ultimate and, by the way, our short-term goal, still, in the meantime, we need to find ways to find these kidneys.

I want to once again thank the gentleman from Washington (Mr. NETHERCUTT) for the opportunity to recognize these individuals that make living donations of a kidney and work with him to make sure that we encourage more of this in the future.

Madam Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. BLILEY. Madam Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Washington (Mr. NETHERCUTT), the principal cosponsor of the bill.

Mr. NETHERCUTT. Madam Speaker, I thank the chairman for his generosity in not only yielding me time on this resolution but his leadership on the part of the Committee on Commerce in bringing this resolution forward today.

I certainly appreciate the remarks of my colleague the gentlewoman from Colorado (Ms. DEGETTE), who has served very, very strongly as co-chair of the Diabetes Caucus. We are in this together, the two of us, notwithstanding our difference in party affiliation.

That is the great thing about the Diabetes Caucus, that it looks beyond party affiliation and seeks to find a cure for diabetes and, thus, help people who have problems with their kidneys.

So I am very grateful to my colleague from Colorado, who has worked so hard and been such a great leader in this issue, along with my chairman, certainly, from the Committee on Commerce, and other Members of this House.

I am delighted to rise in support of this resolution, my own, that I introduced with other Members that recognizes the generous contribution of living kidney donors and acknowledges the advances made in medical technology that enable living kidney transplants to be a viable treatment option.

The gentlewoman from Colorado (Ms. DEGETTE) and the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. BLILEY) spoke well of the statistical information that is out there with regard to the scope of the problem of kidney transplants and kidney disease.

In 1997, 73,000 new patients began treatment for end stage renal disease. Of those new patients, nearly half also had diabetes. I have had the opportunity to visit my hospitals in the Fifth Congressional District of Washington, one of which is Sacred Heart Medical Center. I went to the kidney dialysis department and spoke with not only the medical people who are serving the public there but those who are undergoing kidney dialysis.

It is not pleasant. It is something that breaks our hearts for the people who are stricken with kidney disease. It is so important that we encourage people to donate kidneys to people who are living so that they can be relieved of their kidney problems. And this is one way to do that, that is having living people donate kidneys to those who are afflicted.

In 1996, over 12,000 kidneys were transplanted in the United States. About 30 percent of these organs came from living donors. Over the last 10 years, the number of patients waiting for a kidney transplant has almost tripled from 14,000 to over 40,000 people. We know that the number of living donors has increased over 100 percent.

Over the last 10 years, from 1985 to 1994, the 10-year survival rate for dialysis patients was just 10 percent. Patients who received a cadaveric kidney had a 55 percent survival rate. However, those who received a kidney from a living family member had a 75 percent chance of living an additional 10 years. If one is that recipient and if one is that donor, that is a very significant percentage increase.

Living kidney donors face the risk and pain associated with major surgery and certainly should be commended for their selflessness. Without the sacrifice of these brave people who decide to make a donation, thousands more would die of kidney failure each year.

Madam Speaker, when I first introduced this resolution, former Senator Jake Garn of Utah called me long distance to express his support for the resolution. For, you see, Senator Garn donated a kidney to his adult daughter; and she has lived very well over the last few years despite having some complications from diabetes and other diseases.

This resolution means something to people out there in the real world, people who have donated and who are waiting for a donation. So my hat is off to Senator Garn and so many others for the recognition they deserve for their commitment to their families and their self sacrifice so that other people can live.

I am one, along with the gentlewoman from Colorado (Ms. DEGETTE) and the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. BLILEY), who has been a strong supporter of medical research. The advances made in medical technology are what makes this life-saving procedure possible.

As the gentlewoman from Colorado (Ms. DEGETTE) mentioned, laparoscopic nephrectomy is a new technique for obtaining a kidney from a living donor that is less invasive and leads to shortened hospital stays and recuperation time. Advances in immuno-suppressive drugs have increased survival rates for transplant recipients. This is fantastic research that is ongoing that is continuing in the NIH through the good work of the chairman of the Committee on Commerce and others.

As we in the Congress and the President work through this final detail on the Labor, Health and Human Services bill, an appropriations bill, I happen to be a member of that committee, it is encouraging to they that we have a mutual commitment to increase funding for biomedical research at the National Institutes of Health.

It is in the national best interests of the country and certainly the interests of every Member of this House and the other body and the President that we increase medical research but we also focus on the absolute sacrifice that is being undertaken every day by selfless people who just want to help save a life. So I urge my colleagues to support this resolution.

I thank, again, the chairman of the Committee on Commerce and the gentlewoman from Colorado (Ms. DEGETTE) for their great work in pursuing this.

Ms. DEGETTE. Madam Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Madam Speaker, again, I would like to thank them for their leadership on this bill.

Mr. STARK. Madam Speaker, I rise in support of House Resolution 94, in recognition of the generous gift made by each living person who has donated a kidney to save a life. Of those approximately 63,000 Americans currently awaiting an organ transplant, almost two-thirds are in need of a kidney. Since 1989, more than 250,000 patients with kidney failure have died. However, with today's medical advances, living kidney transplantation has become a feasible treatment option for patients with end stage renal disease. Unfortunately, the number of people on the waiting list continues to grow more quickly than the number of organ donors.

Research points to a clear need for incentive programs and public education to increase organ donation. To help encourage donations and to increase the number of organs available for potential donation, I introduced legislation this Congress, H.R. 941, the ''Gift of Life Congressional Medal Act of 1999.'' This bill would create a commemorative medal that honors organ donors and their families. We need to use every possible opportunity to increase the number of donated organs. This Act is intended to draw attention to this life-saving issue, and to send a clear message that donating one's organs is a selfless act that should receive the profound respect of our Nation. I hope Members would also consider this effort to increase donations.

In addition to increasing the number of organ donors, it is important that we ensure our nation's organ allocation system is fair. Unfortunately, the current system relies more on geography than medical urgency. As a result, organs are offered first to people in a local, regional area and only when there are no local patients available is the organ offered to sicker patients on a broader level. This means that some of the most deserving of patients will not receive an organ solely because of where they live or where they undergo treatment—which often times is a health plan's decision.

In fact, patient outcome data recently released by the Department of Health and Human Services (HHS) suggest a patient's chances of getting a new heart or liver and surviving at least a year greatly varies depending on where the patient goes for a transplant. For example, at the University of Kansas Medical Center, 89% of people waiting for liver transplants received them within a year in the mid-1990s, while at the University of Maryland in Baltimore, only 21% of patients received livers within a year. Depending on the transplant center, a patient's likelihood of dying within a year of listing for a liver transplant can range from 7% to 22%. A system that offers a level playing field to all patients no matter where they live is in everyone's best interest—medical urgency rather than geography should be the determining standard.

Today, as we recognize the generous contribution made by each living kidney donor, we here in Congress need to be consistent in our message. While we're encouraging people to serve as organ donors, we also have Members introducing legislation that would harm organ donations and would permit geography to continue to serve as a barrier to organ allocation and transplantation.

For example, the ''Organ Procurement and Transplantation Network Amendments of 1999'' (H.R. 2418) would remove HHS' legitimate authority to oversee the organ allocation program and would require HHS to rewrite its recently revised organ allocation regulations, while it simultaneously makes data less available to the public. If enacted, the transplant center performance data recently released by HHS would be unavailable to the public. This harmful legislation would set different allocation policies than recommended by the Institute of Medicine (IoM) and is probably unconstitutional in its delegation of power to a private contractor.

Perhaps most disturbing, H.R. 2418 would provide unreasonable protections for The United Network for Organ Sharing (UNOS), the current private contractor in charge of disturbing organs procured for transplant. A recent Forbes magazine article characterized UNOS as ''the organ king: an outfit with life-and-death power over patients waiting for transplants'' which has ''evolved into a heavy-handed private fiefdom.'' This bill essentially gives UNOS a monopoly on the contract and the Forbes article provides even further evidence of the need to oppose legislation which protects this contractor.

We are also currently facing a 90-day moratorium effort in the Labor-HHS Appropriations bill and just last Friday, legislation was introduced to delay the effective date of the HHS rule. This delay of the Secretary's organ allocation rule would keep the Administration from implementing the important, new HHS regulations, strongly supported by evidence from the IoM, and would lead to hundreds more needless deaths. The HHS organ allocation regulation attempts to move to a system based on medical necessity instead of geography with medical professionals making medical decisions about the best way to allocate the limited number of donated organs. The rule incorporates comments from the IoM, transplant community, patients, and the general public to ensure the neediest patients receive organs first—regardless of where they live. Further efforts to delay this rule are only causing needless deaths.

In vetoing the DC-Labor-HHS appropriations bill last week, the President called the appropriations rider that would delay the implementation of HHS' final Organ Procurement and Transplantation rule for 90 days ''a highly objectionable provision.'' As the President stated: the HHS rule ''provides a more equitable system of treatment . . . its implementation would likely prevent the deaths of hundreds of Americans.'' I would hope that the President's strong opposition to the Appropriations bill's moratorium on the HHS transplant regulation will be honored by Congress.

Let's increase the number of organ donors, make our organ allocation system fair, and bring an end to all the needless deaths. And let's be consistent in our message—vote for H. Res. 94 to recognize those who so generously give the gift of life. Vote against any effort to remove or delay the Secretary's legitimate oversight authority and to give a private contractor a monopoly over the nation's organ allocation program. And support a fairer allocation system that bases transplant decisions on common medical criteria and pure professional medical opinion and medical need—not geography.

Mr. CAPUANO. Madam Speaker, I rise to commend those living persons who have given the precious gift of life through the selfless act of donating a kidney. Today I join the majority of the Members of Congress in supporting H. Res. 94, which recognizes the generous contributions of those who have made this sacrifice, and acknowledging the advances in medical technology that have made living kidney transplants a viable treatment option.

Madam Speaker, on many occasions this session, Congress has debated the costs of health care and health related research. These debates would be futile were it not for the courage of the living donors who make specialized medical services, such as kidney transplants, possible. Today, we have come together not in debate but rather in overwhelming support of those individuals that live day to day with life threatening kidney ailments as well as the families who support these individuals in their time of need. More importantly, we are here to pay homage to those ordinary heroes, whose contributions to medical science will not be measured by prominent appearances in medical journals, but whose actions will be forever recorded in the hearts and minds of the individuals to whom they have donated a kidney.

Madam Speaker, in my district, I know of numerous life-saving acts that were unselfishly committed by individuals whose courage was not realized until the idea of kidney donation was thrust upon them. With this in mind I would like to take this opportunity to acknowledge that their actions have not gone unnoticed and to thank these remarkable citizens for their contributions to their families and neighbors.

Ms. DEGETTE. Madam Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. BLILEY. Madam Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mrs. BIGGERT). The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. BLILEY) that the House suspend the rules and agree to the resolution, H. Res. 94.

The question was taken.

Mr. BLILEY. Madam Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to clause 8 of rule XX and the Chair's prior announcement, further proceedings on this motion will be postponed.

EMIGRANT WILDERNESS PRESERVATION ACT OF 1999

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Madam Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H.R. 359) to clarify the intent of Congress in Public Law 93–632 to require the Secretary of Agriculture to continue to provide for the maintenance and operation of 18 concrete dams and weirs that were located in the Emigrant Wilderness at the time the wilderness area was designated in that Public Law, as amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

H.R. 359

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to the rule, the gentleman from California (Mr. DOOLITTLE) and the gentleman from California (Mr. DOOLEY) each will control 20 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from California (Mr. DOOLITTLE).

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Madam Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Madam Speaker, this legislation, the Emigrant Wilderness Preservation Act of 1999, was designed to provide for the maintenance and operation of 18 small water empowerment structures within the Emigrant Wilderness.

Similar legislation last Congress, H.R. 1663, received overwhelming support when it was brought before this House, passing on the floor by a vote of 424 to 2. The Emigrant Wilderness's 18 check dam system was built between 1921 and 1954 through the combined efforts of the U.S. Forest Service, the California Conservation Corps., and local volunteer groups.

This system works to enhance the high elevation lake fisheries and species habitat by keeping year-round flows in the streams. Although, I feel it is imperative that all 18 dams be maintained and operated, in an effort to move this legislation and allow for the immediate preservation of the fisheries and ecosystem of this area, I have come to an agreement with my colleague the gentleman from California (Mr. MILLER).

I have submitted an amendment in the nature of a substitute that has bipartisan support decreasing the number of water empowerment structures preserved in this legislation from 18 to 12.

H.R. 359 will allow a non-Federal entity to pay the cost of maintaining and repairing these substantially unnoticeable structures by allowing the Secretary of Agriculture to enter into a cooperative agreement providing the non-Federal entity the opportunity to conduct the necessary maintenance. By providing for the continued maintenance and operation of these 12 structures, we will protect the stream flow system within the Emigrant Wilderness that for over 70 years has maintained an ecosystem of lakes, streams, and meadows upon which many species, including the great American bald eagle, depend.

If these small, unnoticeable structures are allowed to deteriorate, many of the lakes and streams will dry up during the summer and fall months, resulting in negative impacts on the ecosystem fisheries, recreation, and the area's tourism economy.

Madam speaker, I offer this amendment in the nature of a substitute as a bipartisan effort to preserve and protect the important historical research within the Emigrant Wilderness. It is my hope that we can move this bill forward with the same resounding support it had last Congress.

I ask for the support of my colleagues and urge them to vote for this legislation.

Mr. DOOLEY of California. Madam Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Madam Speaker, I rise in support of this legislation. This bill would authorize the Forest Service to continue to maintain small water impoundment structures located within the Emigrant Wilderness Area of the Stanislaus National Forest in California. The legislation was reported unanimously by the Committee on Resources on May 5 of this year, and it has been further refined by the sponsor to reflect priorities of the California Department of Fish and Game.

The 18 small dams and weirs at issue were built earlier in this century and were in existence long before Congress designated the Emigrant Wilderness in 1974. In fact, seven other structures are eligible for the National Register of Historic Places. For many years after the wilderness was created, several structures were maintained for their recreational fisheries values by the California Department of Fish and Game.

While it is clear that Congress was well aware of the water impoundment structures when the wilderness was created in 1974, the authority for continued maintenance has been brought into question. Accordingly, the purpose of this bill is to authorize a public process, consistent with NEPA, for the Forest Service to determine the levels of necessary maintenance.

It is important to recognize that nothing in the legislation provides for any authority for motorized intrusion in the wilderness area. This is a very unique circumstance and the legislation is not intended to set a precedent for other wilderness areas.

What is contemplated under the bill is that community volunteers would offer their time and effort and perform the necessary work under the supervision and according to standards set by the Forest Service. As amended, the bill provides that the 12 structures identified by the Department of Fish and Game be considered as priorities for retention. One or more of the other six structures may also be eligible for maintenance, subject to the consent of the Forest Service and the State of California.

Madam Speaker, I also would note that the legislation has been endorsed by California Trout, Trout Unlimited, and the Backcountry Horsemen of California, whose members are interested in volunteering time to do the repairs. In closing, I want to recognize the work that the gentleman from California (Mr. DOOLITTLE) has done on this bill. I urge support for it from our colleagues.

Madam Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Madam Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mrs. BIGGERT). The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from California (Mr. DOOLITTLE) that the House suspend the rules and pass the bill, H.R. 359, as amended.

The question was taken; and (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the bill, as amended, was passed.

The title of the bill was amended so as to read: ''A bill to clarify the intent of Congress in Public Law 93–632 to require the Secretary of Agriculture to continue to provide for the maintenance and operation of certain water impoundment structures that were located in the Emigrant Wilderness at the time the wilderness area was designated in that Public Law.''.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

RESOURCES REPORTS RESTORATION ACT

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Madam Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H.R. 3002) to provide for the continued preparation of certain useful reports concerning public lands, Native Americans, fisheries, wildlife, insular areas, and other natural resources-related matters, and to repeal provisions of law regarding terminated reporting requirements concerning such matters.

The Clerk read as follows:

H.R. 3002

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the ''Resources Reports Restoration Act''.

SEC. 2. NATURAL RESOURCES-RELATED REPORTING REQUIREMENTS.

(a) PRESERVATION OF CERTAIN REPORTING REQUIREMENTS.—Section 3003(a)(1) of the Federal Reports Elimination and Sunset Act of 1995 (Public Law 104–66; 31 U.S.C. 1113 note) does not apply to any report required to be submitted under any of the following provisions of law:

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to the rule, the gentleman from California (Mr. DOOLITTLE) and the gentleman from California (Mr. DOOLEY) each will control 20 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from California (Mr. DOOLITTLE).

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Madam Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Madam Speaker, H.R. 3002 will provide for the continued preparation of certain useful reports concerning public lands, Native Americans, fisheries, wildlife, insular areas and other natural resources-related matters.

Section 3003 of the Federal Reports Elimination and Sunset Act of 1997 terminates all reports to Congress contained in House Document 103–7 as of December 21, 1999. This document lists statutorily required reports to Congress from various executive branch agencies.

The philosophy of the Federal Reports Elimination and Sunset Act is to ''alleviate the paperwork burden on executive branch agencies.'' Certainly the reduction of unnecessary paperwork is a worthy goal. However, some consideration must be given as to why a statute mandates a certain report and as to how this information is used by the Congress and the public. In the case of the Committee on Resources, this information greatly aids our oversight activities and the development of legislation. The reports also provide the public with valuable insight as to how Federal tax dollars are being spent.

Without action by Congress, many critical reports will be lost before the end of the year, requiring extensive amendments to underlying statutory authorities to reinstate the reports. H.R. 3002 will restore 128 reports, including implementation costs of the Endangered Species Act, notices of withdrawals of public lands, rehabilitation needs for National Forest System lands, threatened areas on the National Register of Historic Places, management plans for National Parks, proposed oil and gas leasing programs on the Outer Continental Shelf, proposals for projects under the Small Reclamation Projects Act, and audits of financial assistance provided to the insular areas of the United States.

The bill also makes technical changes to some underlying laws which authorize repealed or sunsetted reports. Time constraints preclude additional mop-up work in this area, but the committee intends to work on technical amendments in another vehicle soon.

These reports are needed for effective congressional oversight and to allow the public to see how their taxpayer dollars are being spent.

I urge support for this bill.

Madam Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. DOOLEY of California. Madam Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Madam Speaker, we have no objection to this legislation. The bill would extend the existing requirements that the administration report to Congress on certain subjects of interest to the Committee on Resources. These reports would otherwise terminate in December 1999 under the Federal Reports Elimination and Sunset Act of 1995.

H.R. 3002 was not subject to a committee hearing. However, since the committee markup, the CBO has concluded that the cost of extending the 128 separate reporting requirements would be about $1 million annually, subject to appropriated funds. And neither OMB nor the affected department or agencies have raised specific concerns about this legislation.

Accordingly, since the administration has not objected to this bill and because it does not appear to be exceedingly burdensome or expensive, we support its passage in the House.

Madam Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Madam Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from California (Mr. DOOLITTLE) that the House suspend the rules and pass the bill, H.R. 3002.

The question was taken; and (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

FACILITATING WATER TRANSFERS IN THE CENTRAL VALLEY PROJECT

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Madam Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H.R. 3077) to amend the Act that authorized construction of the San Luis Unit of the Central Valley Project, California, to facilitate water transfers in the Central Valley Project, as amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

H.R. 3077

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. ELIMINATION OF RESTRICTIONS ON USE OF SAN LUIS UNIT FACILITIES FOR WATER TRANSFERS IN THE CENTRAL VALLEY PROJECT.

(a) ELIMINATION OF STATUTORY RESTRICTIONS.—Public Law 86–488 (74 Stat. 156) is amended—

(1) in section 2 by striking ''and the use of the additional capacity for water service shall be limited to service outside of the Federal San Luis unit service area''; and

(2) in section 3 by adding ''and'' after the semicolon at the end of paragraph (h), by striking the semicolon at the end of paragraph (i) and inserting a period, and by striking paragraph (j).

(b) REQUIREMENTS FOR DELIVERY INSIDE FEDERAL SERVICE AREA.—Such Act is further amended—

(1) in section 2 by inserting ''(subject to section 9)'' after ''a perpetual right to the use of such additional capacity''; and

(2) by adding at the end the following:

''SEC. 9. The State of California may not, under section 2, use additional capacity to deliver water inside the Federal San Luis unit service area unless—

''(1) such delivery is managed so as to ensure that—

''(A) agricultural drainage discharges arising from use of the delivered water—

''(i) comply with any waste discharge requirements issued for such discharges; or

''(ii) if there are no such waste discharge requirements, do not cause water quality conditions in the San Joaquin River and the Sacramento-San Joaquin Delta and San Francisco Bay to be degraded or otherwise adversely affected; and

''(B) use of the delivered water for irrigation does not frustrate or interfere with efforts by the United States and the State of California to manage agricultural subsurface drainage discharges from the San Luis unit; and

''(2) such delivery is consistent with those provisions of operating agreements between the Secretary and the Department of Water Resources of the State of California that are consistent with this Act.''.

(c) AMENDMENT OF EXISTING AGREEMENTS.—The Secretary of the Interior—

(1) shall seek to amend each agreement entered into by the United States and the State of California under section 2 of Public Law 86–488 before the date of the enactment of this Act, as necessary to delete from such agreement restrictions on use of additional capacity for water service for land in the Federal San Luis unit service area that are not consistent with the amendments made by this Act; and

(2) pending such amendment, shall not enforce any such restriction.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to the rule, the gentleman from California (Mr. DOOLITTLE) and the gentleman from California (Mr. DOOLEY) each will control 20 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from California (Mr. DOOLITTLE).

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Madam Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Madam Speaker, Federal agricultural contractors in the Central Valley Project of California who rely on exported water supplies from the Sacramento-San Joaquin River Delta have seen substantial reductions in their Federal water supplies over the last several years, even though these last few years have been ''wet'' years. This reduction has been increased because of the accumulated impacts of implementation of the Endangered Species Act, the Central Valley Project Improvement Act, and the Bay Delta Accord.

This reduction in CVP export supply reliability has increased the desire of many water managers to pursue water transfers. Additionally, numerous State laws and Federal laws have been enacted in an attempt to facilitate water transfers to assist agricultural and urban water users in maintaining reliable water supplies.

The San Luis Act of 1960 prohibits the State of California from providing water service to the San Luis Unit of the Central Valley Project. The committee believes this prohibition is inconsistent with current Federal and State policies which encourage and facilitate water transfers.

H.R. 3077 amends the Act of 1960 by eliminating the restrictions on use of San Luis Unit facilities for water transfers in the Central Valley. The gentleman from California (Mr. DOOLEY) is the author of this legislation, and in just a moment I am sure will add his explanation.

This morning we received a letter from Governor Grey Davis of California in support of H.R. 3077.

Madam Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. DOOLEY of California. Madam Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Madam Speaker, California's San Joaquin Valley is one of the most productive agricultural areas in the world. The lands that receive water from the San Luis Unit of the Central Valley Project are especially productive. Farmers here are highly dependent on reliable deliveries of surface water in order to sustain crop production in the valley.

But even in the best years, water supplies from the Central Valley Project are often limited. Many farmers in California now improve the reliability of their water supplies by working out water transfer arrangements with other water users so that the limited supplies can be moved around and used more efficiently. But farmers in the San Luis Unit cannot freely participate in these transfers because the San Luis Act of 1960 prohibits the State of California from providing water service to the San Luis Unit. I believe this restriction makes it unnecessarily difficult for San Luis Unit farmers to take advantage of water supplies that might otherwise be available to them. I also believe this restriction in Federal law is outdated and inappropriate. H.R. 3077, as amended, will address these problems by eliminating the restriction on delivery of water from the State of California to lands within the Federal San Luis service area.

This is significant legislation affecting water management in California. Its effect will be to allow the delivery of water from California's State Water Project to lands within the San Luis Unit. The State of California operates the State Water Project, and Governor Davis, as the gentleman from California (Mr. DOOLITTLE) cited earlier, has advised me and others that he supports enactment of H.R. 3077, as amended.

Madam Speaker, I include the Governor's letter of November 5, 1999 at this point in the RECORD.

GOVERNOR GRAY DAVIS,
Sacramento, CA, November 5, 1999.

Hon. CAL DOOLEY,
House of Representatives,
Washington, DC.

DEAR REPRESENTATIVE DOOLEY: I am writing to advise you of my support for H.R. 3077, which you recently introduced along with Representatives Gary Condit, George Radanovich and Bill Thomas.

As you know, H.R. 3077 would authorize water users in the San Luis Unit of the Central Valley Project (CVP) to purchase water supplies from the State Water Project (SWP). The bill amends the San Luis Act of 1960, which prohibits water transfers between the SWP and users in the San Luis Unit of the CVP.

Given the likelihood of water shortfalls in the future, I believe that voluntary transfers will become an increasingly important water management tool to address future supply needs. Your legislation is consistent with current state and federal policies aimed at encouraging voluntary water transfers and will likely play a key role in facilitating such transfers. In addition, in furtherance of state and federal policies to encourage water transfers, it is appropriate to remove barriers that might otherwise restrict transfers between the two projects.

I also support Representative George Miller's recent amendment to H.R. 3077 that conditions the transfer of water between the SWP and the San Luis Unit on measures to prevent irrigation drainage problems or degradation of water quality. I am pleased that you and your colleagues on the House Resources Committee were able to reach agreement on this language during the recent markup session.

As the legislation moves through the House in the closing days of this year's session, please let me know if I can be of assistance.

Sincerely,

GRAY DAVIS.

An important issue raised by any proposal to provide additional supplies of irrigation water to the San Luis Unit is subsurface drainage. Discharges of subsurface agriculture drainage from the San Luis Unit contributed to the deaths of hundreds of waterfowl at the Kesterson Reservoir site in the mid 1980s, and, while farmers and water districts in the San Joaquin Valley have made great progress in recent years, drainage management in the San Luis Unit continues to be a critical and unresolved issue.

I had the opportunity to participate with Secretary Babbitt just yesterday in doing a tour of the San Luis Unit and had the chance to see some of the terrific work that the water districts are doing there in order to try to manage their drainage water.

The Committee on Resources accepted an amendment on this subject offered by the gentleman from California (Mr. GEORGE MILLER), the senior Democrat on the committee. The gentleman from California's amendment would allow the State to deliver water to the San Luis Unit only after specific requirements have been met to protect water quality.

The purpose of the Miller amendment is to ensure that irrigation water deliveries from the State Water Project to the Federal San Luis Unit service area are carefully managed and are not directed to lands that are known to contribute to agricultural drainage problems with the resultant adverse effects on water quality in the San Joaquin River, the Sacramento-San Joaquin Delta, or San Francisco Bay. I was pleased to accept the gentleman from California's amendment during the committee's consideration of H.R. 3077. Governor Davis' letter also expresses his support for this amendment.

Madam Speaker, San Luis Unit farmers are the only farmers in the State of California who must farm under an outdated legal restriction that prevents them from supplementing their water supplies. H.R. 3077, as amended, will correct this inequity and will encourage responsible water use and cooperation among California water users.

I urge my colleagues to support the enactment of H.R. 3077, as amended.

Madam Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

□ 1500

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Madam Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from California (Mr. RADANOVICH), a cosponsor of this legislation.

Mr. RADANOVICH. Madam Speaker, I thank the gentleman from California for yielding me this time.

As a cosponsor of H.R. 3077, I want to express my support for this bill on the floor. As we all know, water is a precious commodity in the State of California and particularly in the great Central Valley. I have seen the extra mile that water users in this area have taken to conserve water. This is not enough, however, because their water supply reliability has been significantly reduced and no certainty in supply is on the horizon for California agriculture and urban water users.

The Central Valley has a long agricultural history, producing over 250 of California's crops. With its fertile soil, temperate climate, and water supply capabilities, the Central Valley produces 8 percent of the agricultural output in the United States, on less than 1 percent of our Nation's farmland. Valley farmers grow nearly half of the fresh fruits and vegetables grown in the entire Nation.

At the same time, the Central Valley is the fastest growing region in the State, placing an ever-increasing demand on its urban water requirements. While agricultural and urban water demands are often in competition with one another, neither can be provided for unless a reliable supply of water is made available. Long-term environmental and habitat restoration needs of the Central Valley ecosystem must also be addressed, squeezing still more water out of a dwindling supply. Currently, under the CVPIA, over one million acre-feet of water is provided for environmental purposes each year.

The demands for agricultural, environmental and urban water uses in the great Central Valley are endless. Since water is directly tied to the economy, any disturbance in its supply will almost certainly result in the loss of jobs and agricultural production. By the year 2020, a net loss of 2.3 million acre-feet of water is projected for agricultural use. This is unacceptable and irresponsible. The impact of such a decline would be devastating. Thus, an adequate water supply should and must be secured.

For these reasons, I am a cosponsor of H.R. 3077. This measure gives water users the ability to obtain water from the State of California by facilitating water transfers at the San Luis Unit. Currently, the San Luis Act prohibits the State from allowing water to go through the San Luis Unit of the Central Valley Project. This will be corrected under H.R. 3077 and some of the tremendous strains on water supplies in the State will be alleviated.

Again, I support this bill and urge its passage.

Mr. DOOLEY of California. Madam Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Madam Speaker, I urge an ''aye'' vote and I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mrs. BIGGERT). The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from California (Mr. DOOLITTLE) that the House suspend the rules and pass the bill, H.R. 3077, as amended.

The question was taken; and (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the bill, as amended, was passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Madam Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days within which to revise and extend their remarks and include extraneous material on H.R. 359, H.R. 3002, and H.R. 3077.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

OFFICE OF GOVERNMENT ETHICS REAUTHORIZATION ACT

Mr. MCHUGH. Madam Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H.R. 2904) to amend the Ethics in Government Act of 1978 to reauthorize funding for the Office of Government Ethics, as amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, of Columbia officer or employee, or by conducting meetings involving any of those individuals; or

''(C) obligating funds of the United States or the District of Columbia.''.

(c) NEW SECTION 202(f).—Section 202 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end the following:

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to the rule, the gentleman from New York (Mr. MCHUGH) and the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. CUMMINGS) each will control 20 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York (Mr. MCHUGH).

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. MCHUGH. Madam Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days within which to revise and extend their remarks on H.R. 2904.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. MCHUGH. Madam Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Madam Speaker, H.R. 2904 accomplished the two objectives that are critically important to ensuring honesty in government and impartiality in the executive branch of government. First, it reauthorizes the Office of Government Ethics through the year 2003. Second, it amends Title XVIII of the United States Code to clarify the definition of the term ''special government employee.''

The Office of Government Ethics is a small agency in the executive branch. Its appropriation for fiscal year 2000 is only $9.1 million, and there are only about 84 full-time equivalent employees in its work force. Nevertheless, it performs a vital function. The Office's mission is to ensure impartiality and integrity in the operation of the Federal Government.

The Office oversees compliance with a variety of ethics laws in the executive branch. It issues rules and regulations on matters such as conflicts of interest, post-employment restrictions, standards of conduct, and financial disclosures.

The Office also reviews financial disclosure statements of certain presidential nominees and appointees, and when necessary, recommends corrective action for violations of ethics laws.

In addition, the Office of Government Ethics trains employees in ethics, provides formal and informal guidance on the interpretation and application of various ethics laws, and evaluates the effectiveness of conflict of interest and other ethics laws.

The Subcommittee on Civil Service of the Committee on Government Reform held an oversight hearing on the Office of Government Ethics shortly before the August recess. That hearing showed that the Office has performed its duties very well. There is no question that the Office has earned reauthorization by this Congress.

It was also vitally important, Madam Speaker, that this Congress clarify section 202 of Title XVIII to make it easier to determine who is a ''special government employee'' and therefore, subject to conflict of interest law and financial disclosure requirements.

Special government employees are informal advisors to presidents and other government officials. Some are compensated, some serve without pay. But in either case, if the integrity of government processes is to be protected, these advisors must be subject to the same conflict of interest laws and financial disclosure requirements as regular government employees.

This is not a new subject for the House. The need for this legislation was first brought to our attention as a result of the Travelgate hearings held by the Committee on Government Reform and Oversight during the 104th Congress.

Those hearings revealed and a subsequent report adopted by the Committee on Government Reform found that certain advisors to the President used their influence to promote their own business interests by actively encouraging the firing of career employees in the White House Travel Office. As a result, the committee's report on the Travelgate investigation recommended that this Congress amend the law to provide clear standards for determining who is a ''special government employee.''

The gentleman from Florida (Mr. SCARBOROUGH), who is not with us at this time, as I hope everyone in the body recognizes having suffered an injury in his home State and from which we wish him a speedy recovery, as chairman of the Subcommittee on Government Management, Information and Technology, has held two hearings on this issue. Witnesses at those hearings also testified in favor of clarifying the definition of ''special government employee.'' Language substantially similar to section 2 of this bill was developed through those hearings.

During the 104th Congress, the House passed essentially the same language in H.R. 3452, the Presidential and Executive Office Accountability Act. Although most of that bill became Public Law 104–331, the ''special government employee'' language was dropped in the conference.

The need for a clearer definition remains, however. I urge all Members to seize this opportunity to promote integrity in government by passing this bill, H.R. 2904, today.

Madam Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Madam Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Madam Speaker, earlier this year, the Subcommittee on Civil Service held a hearing on the Office of Government Ethics which gave the subcommittee an opportunity to establish a record of how the agency is operating. OGE's mission is not only to prevent and resolve conflicts of interest and to foster high ethical standards for Federal employees, but also to strengthen the public's confidence that the government's business is conducted with impartiality and integrity.

OGE does this by reviewing and certifying the financial disclosure forms filed by presidential nominees requiring Senate confirmation; serving as a primary source of advice and counseling on conduct and financial disclosure issues, and by providing information on the promoting and understanding of ethical standards in executive agencies.

OGE and its staff are well regarded by the Federal agencies with whom they do business. There is no question that they do an outstanding job.

Witnesses at the hearing testified that OGE has played an essential and significant role in fostering the public's trust in the integrity of government. Therefore, I support the 4-year reauthorization of OGE and urge my colleagues to do the same.

I want to thank the gentleman from Florida (Mr. SCARBOROUGH), our subcommittee chairman, for all of his efforts, our chairman and our ranking member of the Committee on Government Reform and Oversight, and certainly the gentleman from New York (Mr. MCHUGH) for his comments today.

Madam Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. MCHUGH. Madam Speaker, I yield myself the balance of the time.

Again, I want to express our appreciation to the gentleman from Florida (Mr. SCARBOROUGH), who currently serves as the chairman of the Subcommittee on Civil Service, for introducing H.R. 2904 to authorize the Office of Government Ethics, and also to the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. BURTON), the chairman of the Committee on Government Reform, for his strong support of this legislation. As well, let me thank the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. CUMMINGS), the ranking member of the Subcommittee on Civil Service, and also the gentleman from California (Mr. WAXMAN), the ranking member of the Committee on Government Reform, for their combined support. Without this cooperative effort, Madam Speaker, we would not be here today.

I also want to commend the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. HYDE), the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, and the gentleman from Florida (Mr. CANADY) of the Subcommittee on the Constitution for their cooperation in expediting consideration of this measure. I also wish to express our appreciation to the gentleman from Florida (Mr. MICA), the former chairman of the Subcommittee on Civil Service, for his strong support for clarifying the definition of ''special government employee.'' As we recognize, Madam Speaker, these kinds of initiatives, it takes the cooperative effort of many, and we thank yet another gentleman from California (Mr. HORN) for adding the ''special government employee'' language to this initiative.

Madam Speaker, although language before the House differs in some minor respects from the bill reported by the Committee on Government Reform, there really is no substantive difference. Working closely with the Office of Government Ethics, we have simply clarified the bill. Promoting the integrity of the Federal Government is critically important if our citizens are to have confidence in its operation. Nothing has made that clearer than our experience with the administration and its unprecedented reliance upon a host of informal advisors such as Harry Thomason, Paul Begala, Dick Morris, and numerous other outsiders who worked on the President's health care task force during his first term. Whether paid or unpaid, full-time or part-time, Madam Speaker, these advisors must be held to the same high ethical standards as regular government employees. Good government demands no less.

Congress has the opportunity today to ensure that existing conflict of interest laws and financial disclosure requirements deter these high-level advisors from using their role to promote their own business interests. I urge all Members to support H.R. 2904.

Madam Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from New York (Mr. MCHUGH) that the House suspend the rules and pass the bill, H.R. 2904, as amended.

The question was taken.

Mr. MCHUGH. Madam Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to clause 8 of rule XX and the Chair's prior announcement, further proceedings on this motion will be postponed.

JOSEPH ILETO POST OFFICE

Mr. MCHUGH. Madam Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H.R. 3189) to designate the United States post office located at 14071 Peyton Drive in Chino Hills, California, as the ''Joseph Ileto Post Office.''

The Clerk read as follows:

H.R. 3189

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. JOSEPH ILETO POST OFFICE.

(a) DESIGNATION.—The United States post office located at 14071 Peyton Drive in Chino Hills, California, shall be known and designated as the ''Joseph Ileto Post Office''.

(b) REFERENCES.—Any reference in a law, map, regulation, document, paper, or other record of the United States to the facility referred to in subsection (a) shall be deemed to be a reference to the ''Joseph Ileto Post Office''.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mrs. BIGGERT). Pursuant to the rule, the gentleman from New York (Mr. MCHUGH) and the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. CUMMINGS) each will control 20 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York (Mr. MCHUGH).

Mr. MCHUGH. Madam Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Madam Speaker, H.R. 3189 was introduced by the gentleman from California (Mr. MILLER) on November 1 of this year. This legislation designates the building of the United States Postal Service located at 1407 Peyton Drive in Chino Hills, California, as the Joseph Ileto Post Office.

This legislation honors Mr. Ileto, an employee of the United States Postal Service who was slain while on duty in a hail of bullets by a white supremacist on August 10, 1999.

According to an affidavit filed in Federal court, the gunman had, just an hour before the shooting, opened fire at a Jewish community center in Los Angeles, wounding five children and employees. While making his rounds, Mr. Ileto encountered the assassin who, according to the affidavit, thought it would be a good idea to kill a nonwhite person who was also a government employee as a target of opportunity.

Mr. Ileto was the oldest of five children, born and raised in the Philippines and named after St. Joseph, the patron saint of the worker. He emigrated to the United States when he was 14 years old. After completing high school, he studied at East Los Angeles College, earning an associate degree in engineering in 1983. He lived with his brother in Chino Hills, and he cared for his recently widowed mother in Monterey Park.

He worked two jobs, at ABX Filters Corporation, where he tested electronic filters for heart pacemakers, and part-time as a substitute mail carrier. He was substituting for a regular letter carrier when he was killed, at age 39. Joseph Ileto took the postal position 2 years ago because he was seeking better pay in an outside job.

Mr. Ileto was known for his goodness, his good humor, his willingness to help, and for being reliable. Joe was known to be a humble man, never wanting to be the center of attention, just wanting to blend into the crowd. His work ethic and reliability won him a Special Achievement Award from the Postal Service. He was also very competitive, and loved playing games and watching the Los Angeles Lakers and the Dodgers.

He was a skilled chess player and was ranked at the master level. The Los Angeles Times and magazines devoted to chess recognized him for his achievements in that regard. His father taught him to play that game at the age of 7.

Uniformed postal workers, in a caravan of more than 100 trucks, paid their respects to their fallen colleague. Every mail carrier in his post office attended the funeral, along with many others from the postal community. Retired mail carriers offered to deliver the mail that day so everyone who knew Joseph could attend, exemplifying the model of mail carriers everywhere, that an injury to one is an injury to all.

Madam Speaker, it is important to note that the Post Office in Chino is near completion, and due to open early next year. It would be fitting that this body take action today on this bill, H.R. 3189, so that the naming of the post office coincides with the opening of this facility. Naming the Post Office in Chino Hills after Joseph Ileto would be an act of remembrance and honor to a person who, though he just wanted to blend into the crowd, exemplifies all the qualities that we look for in an outstanding citizen of this great Nation.

I also want to, Madam Speaker, take one moment to express our most heartfelt sympathy to the family and friends of this brave man. They share in this honor. We come to this floor many times each session and extend the privilege of a postal naming bill to presidents, to people who, in very real ways, made world history, to heroes of all kinds. Today we honor a hero of a somewhat different kind, but certainly no less a deserving individual.

I would strongly urge all of our colleagues to support this bill and to extend this honor to a very, very special man.

Madam Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Madam Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Madam Speaker, as a member of the Committee on Government Reform and Oversight, I am pleased to join the gentleman from New York (Chairman MCHUGH) in the consideration of two postal naming bills, H.R. 3189, to designate the United States Post Office located at 41071 Peyton Drive in Chino Hills, California, as the Joseph Ileto Post Office, and H.R. 2307, to designate the United States Post Office located at 5 Cedar Street in Hopkinton, Massachusetts, as the Thomas J. Brown Post Office Building.

H.R. 319, introduced by the gentleman from California (Mr. GARY MILLER) on November 1, 1999, seeks to honor a fallen postal employee, Mr. Joseph Santos Ileto. My colleagues will remember that Mr. Ileto was slain on August 10, 1999, by a gunman who shot and wounded five children and employees at the North Valley Jewish Community Center in suburban Los Angeles.

Mr. Ileto was a letter carrier for the United States Postal Service. While he lived in Chino Hills, California, he worked at the Chatsworth Post Office, located at 21606 Devonshire Boulevard in Chatsworth, California.

A letter carrier for just 2 years, he was remembered by the Chatsworth Postmaster, Ramona Franco, as a good employee with a wonderful sense of humor. According to Postmaster Franco, Mr. Ileto was the recent recipient of a Special Achievement Award and recognized for his outstanding performance.

Joseph Santos Ileto was born on March 10, 1960, in Legaspi City, Philippines, and named after St. Joseph, the patron saint of workers. A Dodgers and Lakers fan, Mr. Ileto was a master chess player who was murdered by white supremacist Buford Furrow while delivering mail on his mail route.

Joseph Santos Ileto was a fine man who loved his family and friends. My colleague, the gentleman from California (Mr. GARY MILLER), is to be commended for recognizing a man who was proud to wear the uniform of the United States Postal Service letter carrier. I would agree with the gentleman from New York (Chairman MCHUGH), it is so appropriate that we take this time to honor this postman.

The thing is that so often when we name buildings, they are not named after the people who do not normally make the front pages of the Washington Post or local papers, but this was a gentleman that so often I would take it that, like many other Post Office people, that we take for granted. They are the people who deliver our mail every day through the cold, the sleet, the wind, the sun, whatever. They are there.

I join the gentleman from New York (Chairman MCHUGH) when he says that we want the family to know of our sympathy, and we want them to know how we feel so strongly about Mr. Ileto. Here is something else that needs to be said, and it is simply this, that in naming this Post Office after this postman, hopefully when people pass that Post Office and see that name up there, they will be reminded of what postmen and postwomen do every day in making sure that our mail is delivered, and making sure that correspondence, which is the lifeblood of any kind of communications process all over the world, is taken care of and taken care of in a very excellent fashion.

To that end, it is indeed a fitting tribute to name a soon-to-be-opened postal facility in Mr. Ileto's hometown in Chino Hills, California, after its fallen son.

Madam Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Guam (Mr. UNDERWOOD).

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Madam Speaker, I thank my colleague for yielding me the time.

Madam Speaker, I stand in strong support of the bill offered by the gentleman from California (Mr. GARY MILLER), H.R. 3189. As outlined, this bill will designate the United States Post Office in Chino Hills the Joseph Ileto Post Office.

I stand in strong support of this on a couple of bases: One, as chairperson of the Asian-Pacific American Caucus in Congress, we have a particular affinity for this particular piece of legislation which is being passed in honor of Joseph Santos Ileto, a Filipino-American postal employee murdered by white supremacist Buford O. Furrow basically for being foreign-looking.

Basically, the entire incident involving the murder of Mr. Ileto was that he looked like a foreigner. He was an Asian-American who was devoting his life to public service in the Post Office.

Certainly I would like to also associate myself with the comments about the Postal Service. My father was postmaster at one time, and my grandfather was postmaster, so we have a long tradition in our family of paying honor and tribute to people who work in the Post Office.

In this particular instance, we have what is usually a person who does not attract much attention, but he is emblematic of the many thousands of people who work for the Postal Service and who carry on their duties on a regular basis.

I want to commend the gentleman from California (Mr. GARY MILLER) on his initiative to remember Joseph Ileto, and to not let the issue go away about the circumstances of his murder and bringing recognition of that. At the same time, I want to point out that the number of hate crimes which have gone on this past year continues to increase in this country.

I think it is very important that, in Mr. Ileto's name, we continue to focus on the issue of hate crimes, of which he was himself a victim, and to continue to support hate crimes legislation. This is an opportunity for us to draw attention to it. It is an opportunity to draw attention to the service of Asian-Pacific Americans in this country.

Also, I would like to again commend the work of our colleague, the gentleman from California (Mr. GARY MILLER) in this matter.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Madam Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Madam Speaker, I want to thank my colleague, the gentleman from Guam, for making a very significant point. That is that, unfortunately, in our country we are still seeing the results of hate crimes. Unfortunately, our friend, Mr. Ileto, died as a result of a hate crime. It is very, very sad.

It is a fact that we are hoping that by taking this moment on the part of the United States Congress to recognize this wonderful, wonderful man, we will say to all of America that we, the Congress of the United States, will not stand for that kind of conduct. As we lift him up and say to Mr. Ileto and to his family that we are grateful for his service and all that he has given us, we also say to all of those who want to wander throughout our country committing these kinds of offenses that we will not stand for it, and we will do everything in our power to stomp it out.

To that end, Madam Speaker, I would urge my colleagues to vote for this very, very important piece of legislation. I thank the chairman, the gentleman from New York (Mr. MCHUGH), the ranking member of our committee, the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. FATTAH), the gentleman from California (Mr. WAXMAN), and the chairman, the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. BURTON).

Madam Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. MCHUGH. Madam Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Madam Speaker, let me first of all express my appreciation to the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. CUMMINGS) and the gentleman from Guam (Mr. UNDERWOOD), and all of the minority members, including, of course, the ranking member, the gentleman from California (Mr. WAXMAN), for their continued and continuous support on these kinds of measures.

□ 1530

I do think it is a very fine example as to how the majority and minority can work toward a common good and a common action.

I also want to thank the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. BURTON), the chairman of the full committee, for his continuous support in these efforts and for helping us to expedite consideration as we wind down the end of this legislative session so that we can, indeed, pay tribute to a very deserving individual.

I want to say that I certainly agree with the comments of the two previous speakers. The cause of this crime was despicable, and I think it is true as well that all Americans find hate and find the kinds of actions fueled by the hate in this instance to be unspeakably evil. And to the extent that we can make a statement against that in this forum, that is a positive thing.

But I would say that we are here today honoring an individual who fell and who was victimized and who we think would be worthy of this honor regardless of the motivations of the criminal who took his life. This is a man who has, through his life, through his roots and the way in which he has overcome, earned all of our admiration.

Madam Speaker, Mr. Ileto I think in many ways is a perfect profile for the American dream, a gentleman who works hard, someone who carries the common values that have continuously bound this Nation together through our more than two centuries of existence. And regardless of his race, his color, his religious beliefs or any other distinguishing factor is a man fully deserving of this honor today.

So with that, Madam Speaker, I offer again our deepest sympathies to Mr. Ileto's family, to his loved ones, and to those who knew him and urge that all Members support this legislation.

Madam Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mrs. BIGGERT). The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from New York (Mr. MCHUGH) that the House suspend the rules and pass the bill, H.R. 3189.

The question was taken; and (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. MCHUGH. Madam Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days within which to revise and extend their remarks on H.R. 3189, the bill just passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

THOMAS J. BROWN POST OFFICE BUILDING

Mr. MCHUGH. Madam Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H.R. 2307) to designate the building of the United States Postal Service located at 5 Cedar Street in Hopkinton, Massachusetts, as the ''Thomas J. Brown Post Office Building''.

The Clerk read as follows:

H.R 2307

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. DESIGNATION.

(a) IN GENERAL.—The building of the United States Postal Service located at 5 Cedar Street in Hopkinton, Massachusetts, shall be known and designated as the ''Thomas J. Brown Post Office Building''.

(b) REFERENCES.—Any reference in a law, map, regulation, document, paper, or other record of the United States to the building referred to in subsection (a) shall be deemed to be a reference to the ''Thomas J. Brown Post Office Building''.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to the rule, the gentleman from New York (Mr. MCHUGH) and the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. CUMMINGS) each will control 20 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York (Mr. MCHUGH).

Mr. MCHUGH. Madam Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Madam Speaker, H.R. 2307 was introduced by the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. MCGOVERN) on June 22 of this year. This legislation designates the building of the United States Postal Service located at 5 Cedar Street in Hopkinton, Massachusetts, as the Thomas J. Brown Post Office Building.

Both the relevant subcommittee and committee approved this legislation, which is cosponsored by the entire House delegation of the State of Massachusetts.

Madam Speaker, Mr. Brown is a past president of the Boston Athletic Association and former postmaster of the town of Hopkinton, which is the starting point for the Boston Marathon. Mr. Brown has been actively involved in the Boston Marathon in his capacity as president of the Boston Athletic Association.

Madam Speaker, again we are here, as we did in the first bill, although under very, very different circumstances, paying tribute to an individual who perhaps does not find his name on the front page of the Nation's newspapers or as one of the lead stories on the evening news broadcast. But, nevertheless, we are here honoring a man who has, through his association, both with the Postal Service and with his activities and love of his community, has shown great leadership in important ways.

I would say, Madam Speaker, that Mr. Brown is a kind of testament to, again, the American way of life, to someone who is not involved in any kind of community activity for power or glory or certainly for enrichment, but rather cares about their neighbors, cares about his association with those neighbors, and works simply to make today better than yesterday and, hopefully, tomorrow a little bit better than today.

I would certainly urge all of our colleagues to support H.R. 2307 and honor this postal employee who is so actively involved in a very important part of his town's history. And I am always, as chairman of the subcommittee, particularly gratified when those postal employees, nearly 900,000 individuals who each day make this wonderful system work so well, are honored in this manner, particularly, as it does in this case, occurring in their hometown in the very facility in which they discharge those duties.

Madam Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Madam Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Madam Speaker, I join the gentleman from New York (Mr. MCHUGH) in his comments with regard to honoring this wonderful former postmaster. As a member of the Committee on Government Reform, I am pleased to join him in consideration of H.R. 2307.

H.R. 2307, introduced by the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. MCGOVERN) on June 22, 1999, seeks to honor Mr. Thomas J. Brown. Mr. Brown is the former postmaster of the town of Hopkinton, Massachusetts, and past president of the Boston Athletic Association. Hopkinton, Massachusetts, is the starting point for the Boston Marathon, and Mr. Brown has been extensively involved in this race in his capacity as president of the BAA.

Designating a post office after a former postmaster is an excellent way to honor Mr. Brown's achievement. Madam Speaker, I could go on into further detail about the numerous community activities Mr. Brown is involved in, but I would prefer to yield time to the sponsor of H.R. 2307, the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. MCGOVERN).

Madam Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. MCHUGH. Madam Speaker, I continue to reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Madam Speaker, I yield 3½ minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. MCGOVERN).

Mr. MCGOVERN. Madam Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. CUMMINGS) not only for his support but for yielding me this time.

Madam Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 2307 to designate the Thomas J. Brown Post Office Building in Hopkinton, Massachusetts. I wish to thank the gentleman from New York (Chairman MCHUGH) for his support and for the support of this subcommittee in moving this bill through the Committee on Government Reform and bringing it to the House floor today.

This bill will name the Federal Post Office at 5 Cedar Street in Hopkinton, Massachusetts, after Thomas J. Brown. Mr. Brown is a long-time resident of Hopkinton, served as postmaster from 1940 to 1970, and this bill will give the brand-new Hopkinton Post Office a name in tribute to a man who has served his community with pride and dignity for over 30 years.

Mr. Brown is a World War II veteran, having served in San Francisco and Pearl Harbor in the Postal Division of the United States Navy from 1942 to 1946. He served on the Board of Governors from 1978 to 1985, and as president from 1982 to 1985 of the Boston Athletic Association. Of national importance, Mr. Brown also served as official starter of the Boston Marathon, the famous 26-mile race that starts in the town of Hopkinton, Massachusetts.

This new post office is vital to the town of Hopkinton. Roughly five times the size of the current building, this new building has an extra customer service window, 800 post office boxes and a stamp vending machine. This new post office is needed because of the rising number of new residents who have moved to Hopkinton in the past decade. These improvements will better serve all the residents of the surrounding area in honor of Mr. Brown and his dedication to his community.

The Town of Hopkinton Office of the Selectmen, the Boston Athletic Association, and the entire Massachusetts congressional delegation support this bill to honor Thomas J. Brown's community service. This is an important bill to the Town of Hopkinton and to the lives of the people Mr. Brown has touched.

Madam Speaker, I urge my colleagues to support H.R. 2307 and name the Hopkinton Post Office after Thomas J. Brown.

Madam Speaker, I would like to submit for the RECORD the following letters of support and related news articles about the new post office and the effort to name it after Mr. Brown.

TOWN OF HOPKINTON,
OFFICE OF THE SELECTMEN,
Hopkinton, MA, June 4, 1999.

Mr. GUY L. MORSE III,
Director, Boston Athletic Association, Boston, MA.

DEAR GUY: The Board of Selectmen received your letter discussing the B.A.A.'s proposal that the new Hopkinton Post Office be dedicated to Tom Brown, long-time resident of the Town, Hopkinton Postmaster from 1940–1970, and official starter of the Boston Marathon for many years.

Our Board strongly supports this proposal. It would be a well-earned tribute to a man who served this community well, over many years.

We hope your proposal will be carefully considered by Congress, and successfully implemented!

Sincerely,

MAUREEN L. DWINNELL,
Chairman.

NEW POST OFFICE IN HOPKINTON

(By John B. Moore)

HOPKINTON.—With little potential for controversy, the new Hopkinton Post Office likely will open this fall and be dedicated to former postmaster and Boston Marathon honcho Thomas J. Brown.

The proposal to name the soon-to-be-opened post office, which passed out of committee earlier this month, is expected to be adopted by Congress by October, if not sooner.

''I'm so pleased this is progressing so well,'' said Guy Morse, president of the Boston Athletic Association and the man behind the move to dedicate the building in Brown's name.

Brown, who served as Hopkinton's postmaster from 1940–1970, now lives in Maine.

A former Hayden Rowe Street resident, he was president of the Boston Athletic Association from 1982–1985. He also served as the official starter of the marathon for a number of years.

''The bill has been marked up by the Committee on Government Reform and when they come back from recess at the beginning of September it will go to the floor,'' said Michael Mershon, a spokesman for U.S. Rep. James McGovern, D-3rd.

''The person I spoke to yesterday said they expect it to pass through the floor of the House no later than mid-October.''

Once the measure is approved, it goes to the U.S. Senate before landing on the president's desk for his signature.

When the bill makes it to the Senate, Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass., will take the reins.

''There has been no doubt in my mind that the new post office in Hopkinton should be named after Tom Brown—someone who has served his community for years as postmaster and who has contributed so much of his time and energy to the Boston Marathon,'' Kerry said.

Along with McGovern and local town officials, Kerry has strongly supported naming the post office after Brown.

''What better way to honor Tom Brown than to name the post office after him right in Hopkinton, where year after year we start the Boston Marathon,'' Kerry said.

Morse toured the new post office earlier this week and spoke with the current postmaster about a ceremony.

''We're looking to hopefully have something in the beginning of October,'' Morse said.

''I'm very pleased that it looks like it might actually come about,'' Morse said. ''I think it's a great testimony to Tom Brown that so many people got involved to make this happen.''

NEW POST OFFICE, AWAITS OFFICIAL FANFARE

(By John B. Moore)

The new post office will receive little fanfare this week.

The big celebration will likely be held in late fall when the building is officially dedicated to former resident and past Boston Marathon President Tom Brown.

''One of the reasons we're moving ahead with the opening is because the asphalt plants will probably be closed by the end of November and we need to have the customer parking lot paved on time,'' said Post Master John Hester.

The future lot now sits under the old, overburdened post office resting in the shadow of the new state-of-the art facility on Cedar Street, scheduled to open Monday.

''We'll close the old building at noon on Saturday and start moving everything over then.'' Hester said Thursday.

The old building will be torn down to make room for more parking spaces. Both buildings are leased to the Postal Service.

The new 13,800-square-foot post office is roughly five times the size of the current building.

''Everyone has been ready for this for a while now,'' Hester said. ''You wouldn't believe how excited we are.''

Hester is among those cheering the new opening. For one thing, he gets to move out of the old trailer parked behind the buildings that has been his office for years.

''The other post office could just about fit in this lobby,'' said Hester, walking inside the new facility yesterday afternoon.

Along with more office space, the new building has an extra customer service window, 800 post office boxes and a stamp vending machine, along with more parking spaces.

There is also an electronic scale inside the lobby allowing customers to weigh and stamp their packages without ever having to wait in line.

There will also be an entire wall lined with prepackaged stamps and other merchandise.

Also in for a change will be the hours of the service windows.

The old building used to open the windows from 7:30 a.m. to 5 p.m. Mondays through Fridays. They will now open an hour later.

''I did a study to determine what people were buying during different hours and what I found out is 90 percent stamps during that early hour,'' Hester said.

With the stamp vending machine, it made little sense to keep the window open for that hour.

The Saturday hours will be shortened, as well, with the post office opening from 8:30 a.m. to noon closing two hours early.

''We just found that the volume wasn't there and like any other businesses we need to control costs,'' he said.

The prime reason for the new building is the soaring number of new residents who have moved into town over the last decade. The old building is simply buckling under the strain.

''This building is set up to anticipate new growth,'' he said. ''This is a building everyone should be proud of.''

Before the building can be dedicated to Brown, U.S. legislators have to give the final OK.

Though the naming measure is routine, it takes time to filter through the House and Senate, an aide to Rep. James McGovern, D–Mass., said.

The ceremony will probably take place in November, said Bob Cannon, a spokesman for the U.S. Postal Service.

Brown, who served as Hopkinton's postmaster for 1940–1970. Now lives in Maine.

A former Hayden Rowe Street resident, he was president of the Boston Athletic Association from 1982–1985. He also served as the official starter of the Marathon for a number of years.

Mr. MCHUGH. Madam Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Madam Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Madam Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. MCGOVERN) for his statement. One of the things that he pointed out, Madam Speaker, is that Mr. Brown is also a veteran. I think so often our veterans play such significant roles while they are in the military and when they leave. And here is another example of a veteran when he left the military to go on and do some very, very significant things to help people.

The gentleman also talked about Mr. Brown being the starter, the person who started the race, and that is very significant when we think about what is happening today. He went on to talk about how this Post Office is much larger so it could serve so many more people as the town has grown.

The fact is that our honoree, Mr. Brown, was one who was there way back when, and now he has seen not only the race grow but he has seen this wonderful town grow. And so it is with great honor and privilege that I take a moment today to, number one, thank Mr. Brown for all that he has done. I also want to thank the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. MCGOVERN) for being so sensitive to all of those people who are supporting this wonderful and very important legislation. I again thank the gentleman from New York (Mr. MCHUGH), the chairman of the Subcommittee on the Postal Service; and I thank the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. FATTAH), the ranking member of that subcommittee; and of course the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. BURTON) and the gentleman from California (Mr. WAXMAN), the chairman and ranking member respectively.

Madam speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. MCHUGH. Madam Speaker, I yield myself the balance of the remaining time.

Madam Speaker, let me associate myself with particularly the last comments by the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. CUMMINGS). Veterans of virtually any war are a very special class of people to whom those of us who enjoy the fruits of this wonderful democracy really owe more than we can ever repay. And I, too, want to thank the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. MCGOVERN) for providing this opportunity to recognize, not only as I said earlier a 3-decade employee of the United States Postal Service, but like so many of his contemporaries, an individual whose record of service extends even beyond that of his service during World War II.

Heroes come in many different forms and walk in many different ways in this life. To the community of Hopkinton, to the Greater Boston area, and to all of those across this country who believe, as I do, that the Boston Marathon is such a special event, without question, this gentleman, Mr. Brown, is a hero. We are very, very lucky today to have this opportunity.

Madam Speaker, I too want to express my appreciation to the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. CUMMINGS) for being here today and for managing this bill, for the continued support of the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. FATTAH) as the ranking member, along with, of course, the gentleman from California (Mr. WAXMAN) as the ranking member of the full committee and the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. BURTON), chairman of the full committee, and his staff and the staff of the Subcommittee on the Postal Service for their untiring work in processing these in the way in which they should be processed: in a bipartisan cooperative manner.

Madam Speaker, I close with a final urging to all of our colleagues to support this fine bill, H.R. 2307.

Madam Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from New York (Mr. MCHUGH) that the House suspend the rules and pass the bill, H.R. 2307.

The question was taken; and (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. MCHUGH. Madam Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days within which to revise and extend their remarks on H.R. 2307, the bill just passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mrs. BIGGERT). Pursuant to the rule, the gentleman from Florida (Mr. MILLER) and the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. CUMMINGS) each will control 20 minutes.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. MILLER of Florida. Madam Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days within which to revise and extend their remarks on H. Res. 344.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

Mr. MILLER of Florida. Madam Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Madam Speaker, I rise in support of House Resolution 344. I would like to thank the distinguished gentleman from Springfield, Missouri (Mr. BLUNT) for providing this House the opportunity to express our condolences to the family of Payne Stewart while enabling us to celebrate his life and accomplishments.

I would also like to thank the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. BURTON), chairman of the Committee on Government Reform, who recognized the timeliness of this measure and expedited this opportunity for consideration before the House today.

This resolution has many cosponsors who welcome the opportunity to provide Payne Stewart this fitting moment of honor. Our celebration of his life is a quiet reflection of the patriotism that he displayed so proudly throughout his professional career.

During that career, Payne Stewart won 11 professional championships, three of them majors. Twice he won the United States Open. He walked the fairways wearing his trademark knickers and tam o'shanter, commonly blending a combination of colors symbolizing the nearest available National Football League team.

His many accomplishments on the golf course were the building blocks that qualified him to represent this country in international competition. His smooth swing, and controlled, steady play were vital to the United States team's dramatic come-from-behind victory in this year's Ryder Cup competition. He took great pride in wearing the red, white, and blue.

His widow and two children knew his full devotion. He took pride in his role as a husband and father, and he provided a model of spirited dedication throughout his life. We welcome this opportunity to recognize his life, and to join the many golf fans throughout the country in extending our condolences to his widow, his children, and his friends.

Madam Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Madam Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Madam Speaker, Payne Stewart, who was an 11-time winner of the PGA Tour and stood eighth in the world golf rankings, died on his way to do what he loved best, died on his way to look at a field with regard to golf.

Payne Stewart was on his way to Houston for practice rounds in advance of the Tour Championship when his plane crashed in South Dakota. Mr. Stewart died with five others, two pilots of the plane Michael King, 43, Stephanie Bellegarrigue, 27, his agents Robert Fraley and Van Ardan and Bruce Borlan, a golf course designer. As expressed by this resolution, our condolences go out to all of the families affected by this terrible crash.

Mr. Stewart, winner of the United States Open at Pinehurst, North Carolina, also played on the Ryder Cup team that won an inspiring comeback victory over Europe in September. He won the Professional Golfer's Association championship in 1989, and in 1991 captured his first U.S. Open title at Hazeltine in Minnesota, after an 18-hole playoff.

Tim Finchem, the PGA Tour Commissioner, is quoted as saying that, ''Payne represented the best of golf. He was a man of great faith, a devoted, compassionate, and most energetic husband and father, and a man of tremendous generosity.'' Tiger Woods, upon hearing the news of Stewart's death, commented, ''It is shocking; it's a tragedy. There is an enormous void and emptiness I feel right now.''

That void and emptiness was felt by the 3,000 people attending Stewart's memorial service, over 100 of which were PGA Tour players and officials. At the memorial service, Paul Azinger, a close friend of Stewart's pulled a tam-o'-shanter cap over his head and rolled up his trousers to knickers length, revealing a vibrant pair of argyle socks, a poignant tribute to the distinctive sports clothing Stewart was known for wearing.

At the start of the PGA Tour Championship that Mr. Stewart was scheduled to play in, a bagpipe played the Scottish lament ''Going Home''. Payne Stewart once said, ''I'm going to a special place when I die. But I want to be sure my life is special while I'm here.''

Payne Stewart is home now, and his life here on Earth was, indeed, special.

Madam Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. MILLER of Florida. Madam Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas (Mr. RYUN), one Olympian in our United States Congress, an Olympic runner.

Mr. RYUN of Kansas. Madam Speaker, Payne Stewart's tragic death shocked the United States and the world just 2 short weeks ago. Today, the House honors him in a fitting tribute to his life.

One does not have to be a golfer to know who Payne Stewart was. While his talent and distinctive style made him stand out on the course, his love of family and love of God, involvement in his community made him stand out as a wonderful human being.

Payne Stewart's accomplishments speak for themselves. He was a member of five Ryder Cup teams, including September's winning team. He won 11 professional tournaments in the United States, including three major golf championships. He was having his best year on the tour; and in the last golf ranking, he was ranked eighth in the world.

Just a few years ago, some golf experts began to write him off, that he was not going to be able to make it. They speculated his career was all but over after a number of years in the PGA without a lot of success. However, after winning this year's U.S. Open, which capped a 4-year return to the top of the golfing world, Payne gave insight into the real reason behind his turnaround. He spoke of a renewed faith in God that had given him inner peace and had led to a stronger family life.

Payne Stewart also gave generously of his time and money to charity causes. He was actively involved in the First Baptist Church in Orlando, Florida. The Reverend Jim Henry, who was one of his pastors, said this of Payne, ''He was a wonderful Christian who had Christ in his life and somehow in his death.''

He was also a good neighbor. One of his neighbors summed it up by saying, ''Payne was an unbelievable person.'' Recent news reports said that he was even well-known among his neighborhood for fixing pancakes after his children's sleep-overs. Parents and fathers should be proud of that, and Payne was certainly a good example.

In the world of sports today, Payne Stewart was every bit of a role model. May God grant us many more Payne Stewarts. By honoring him today, we express our thanks for his example, and we offer our prayers and condolences to his family for their loss.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Madam Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from American Samoa (Mr. FALEOMAVAEGA).

Mr. FALEOMAVAEGA. Madam Speaker, I want to thank the gentleman from Maryland for extending me this time to say a few words in support of this great American.

Madam Speaker, I rise today in strong support of this legislation which honors professional golfer Payne Stewart and expresses the heartfelt condolences of our Nation to Payne Stewart's family upon his tragic death. I want to commend the gentleman from Missouri (Mr. BLUNT), my good friend, for introducing this most worthy measure.

Like many around the world, I was shocked and saddened by the events of October 25, 2 weeks ago, when the Lear Jet carrying Payne Stewart became disabled and crashed. The accident reminds us of how fleeting and uncertain life can be, no matter what our status is.

Madam Speaker, although Payne Stewart has left this earthly existence, his legacy and what his life stood for will continue to live on in our memory and in the annals of sports and history.

As a hacker who loves the game of golf, and all my colleagues on this side of the aisle who also love the sport, Madam Speaker, I fully appreciate and understand how difficult, demanding, and frustrating the sport of golf can be, especially at the rarefied levels of professional golf. Therefore, I deeply respect the tremendous achievements of Payne Stewart in winning 11 PGA tournaments in his shortened career, which include three major championships, the PGA in 1989, the U.S. Open in 1991, and the U.S. Open this year.

Winning even one major championship is considered the pinnacle of excellence and the defining moment in a professional golfer's career. It is not surprising that an athlete of Payne Stewart's brilliance earned this honor several times.

While Payne Stewart's shot-making and colorful knickers attire attracted a lot of attention, what most impressed me about Payne Stewart was the class and sportsmanship that he showed while competing. After his heartbreaking loss in the 1998 U.S. Open in the closing moments due to a bad break, a divot lie after a perfect drive in the fairway, many will remember that Mr. Stewart held his head high and refused to make excuses in response to those that accused him of choking. This year, he answered those critics by sinking the longest putt ever to win the U.S. Open.

Madam Speaker, for the past several years, I had hoped, it was like a dream to me, that perhaps someday I might have the honor and privilege of playing a round with golfer Payne Stewart. He would wear his stylistic knickers for which he is so famous for, and I would wear my Samoan lavalava, an attire that looks somewhat like a skirt, but I call it the Samoan version of the Scottish kilts that Scotsmen wear when playing golf at St. Andrews. Since the game of golf originated, it is my understanding, in Scotland, I am surprised that the great golfer Colin Montgomery does not wear his kilt when he plays golf. I suspect that Mr. Stewart would have done the same if he had lived a little longer.

In September at the Ryder Cup matches, after the competition had already been decided, Payne Stewart showed class and character again by conceding a winning putt to his opponent, Colin Montgomery, who he felt had endured vicious heckling and taunting all day from overzealous American fans. While the conceded shot ensured Payne's loss in the singles match, it was a heartfelt gesture of class by a true gentleman and a true American. The act of sportsmanship symbolized what Payne Stewart was all about, and endeared him to millions around the world.

Madam Speaker, I urge our colleagues to join us in this measure honoring Payne Stewart, a great and generous man, a man of intense religious faith, a man of deep family commitment, a champion and fierce competitor, and a loyal and patriotic son of America.

We send our condolences, deepest condolences to the family of Payne Stewart and to the families of all those who perished with them.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Madam Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Madam Speaker, the gentleman from American Samoa (Mr. FALEOMAVAEGA) and the gentleman from Kansas (Mr. RYUN) spoke about Payne Stewart's religious faith. It is interesting to note that, after the 1998 U.S. Open, when Mr. Stewart failed to come in first, many did, in fact, accuse him of choking. But the fact is he did not choke. He just did not win.

It is interesting that, after the 1999 U.S. Open, when he did come in first, he said something that I think should become a part of the DNA of every one of us. He said, ''I have got to give thanks to the Lord for giving me the ability to believe in myself. Without that peace I have in my heart, I would not be sitting here today.'' Those are very profound words because those are words of a true champion.

So often champions lose and have to dust themselves off, get back up, and come out the next day. What Mr. Stewart was saying is that, although I may not have come in first in 1998, I just thank God for giving me the peace to continue to believe in myself so that I can come in first in 1999.

I think that is a lesson that he leaves with all of us, for our children, and for our children's children, and for everybody who plays this wonderful sport called golf, or any other sport for that matter, that we must hope and pray that we have the peace, the simple peace, and the belief in ourselves to always come back the next day and be victorious, and even if we are not, just the idea of knowing that we still have that peace.

With that, it is a great honor that I urge all of my colleagues to support this legislation.

Madam Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

□ 1600

Mr. MILLER of Florida. Madam Speaker, I yield myself the balance of my time.

It is a special honor for me to be here today to present this resolution. As a Floridian, Payne Stewart lived in the Orlando area. Of course, my home is over in the Bradenton area, 100 miles away. The gentleman from Florida (Mr. MCCOLLUM) represents Payne Stewart's district and was, unfortunately, unable to be here today because of flight schedules, but did present something on the floor of the House shortly after his death.

The gentleman from Missouri (Mr. BLUNT) also wanted to be here today but, unfortunately as well, due to flight schedules, was not able to be here. He represents Springfield, Missouri, which is the original hometown of Payne Stewart, and his death was especially felt in that community.

My colleague from Maryland talked about Paul Azinger, who is one of my constituents back in Bradenton, Florida, and just the photograph and the description of that when he gave the eulogy just conveyed the personality, the warmth, the love that his colleagues and all felt for this person.

House Resolution 344 provides a fitting commemoration of this exuberant and accomplished professional and patriot. Today, he ranks as the third leading money winner in golf history, but he is at the top of the list in terms of the character and dedication that he brought to his wonderful life.

I am proud to bring this legislation to the floor, and I ask for the full support of all Members on this resolution.

Mr. McCOLLUM. Madam Speaker, I rise today to honor and remember one of America's true professionals and most notable golfers, Payne Stewart. On October 25, 1999, America lost a great sportsman and Central Florida lost one of it's most beloved citizens. However, the memory and legacy of Payne Stewart continue to live through the contributions he made not only in the sports world, but also in the Orlando community where he lived.

He was a great golfer for many reasons—20 years in the professionals, 3 majors wins, 8 PGA tours, and 7 victories worldwide. None of us can forget that famous 15-foot birdie putt in the U.S. Open this year which gave him the great victory only a few months ago at Pinehurst—a victory that came as a result of the longest putt in the history of the U.S. Open.

But Payne Stewart was much more than a great golfer. He was a humanitarian, who held great convictions. In 1983, Payne and his family made their home in Orlando in my congressional district. I can tell my colleagues that the people of Central Florida benefited greatly from Payne's generosity and his warmth and compassion for other people.

Payne Stewart was more than just a role model to the many aspiring young athletes in our state and across the nation. He was someone who used the profile he earned on the golf course to make our community a better place. Just last month, Payne and his wife, Tracey, gave $500,000 to the First Baptist Church of Orlando to be used in part for expansion of the Christian school on the church grounds.

Perhaps his most well-known charitable contribution came back in 1987 when he donated $108,000, his winnings from the Bay Hill Classic tournament, to the Florida Hospital. Those funds went to the Florida Hospital Circle of Care home in Altamonte Springs for the out-of-town parents of cancer patients. He was someone who truly recognized the joy of giving and making a difference in the lives of children.

Payne was also a devoted family man, who was proud that his faith in God provided him with strength and peace. Though his love for the game of golf ran deep, his love for his family ran deeper still. He was a dedicated father and husband. On more than one occasion, Payne commented publicly that he most enjoyed being at home, being a father, making breakfast, and taking his kids to school.

I know that many Floridians will miss him deeply. Many in Central Florida will miss him, not only because of his golf career and because of his wit, but because of his charitable contributions. But a lot will miss him personally.

But I think the people who are obviously going to miss him most will be his wife, Tracey, and his two wonderful children, Chelsea and Aaron. Our hearts go out to them, to Payne's family. He was a great man, a great golfer. His life ended in tragedy, but he gave so much to so many.

Although we continue to mourn the loss of Payne Stewart and his contributions to the world of sports, his community and to his family, we are blessed to have been influenced by his enthusiasm and love for life, which none of us will soon forget. Payne Stewart is husband, father, golfer and friend who will be long remembered and long cherished.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Madam Speaker, Payne Stewart transcended the game of golf and will always be a timeless symbol of athletic talent, spirited competition, and a role model as a Christian gentleman.

That's why I'm proud to join my colleague from Missouri, Congressman BLUNT, in sponsoring H. Res. 344, a resolution recognizing and honoring Payne Stewart, and expressing the condolences of the House of Representatives to his family, and the families of the other victims who perished in the October 25th plane crash.

At the age of 42, and while experiencing the best year as a professional golfer in his life, U.S. Open Champion Payne Stewart, a devoted father and husband, tragically was killed in a plane crash along with Van Arden, Stephanie Bellegarrigue, Bruce Borland, Robert Fraley, and Michael Kling.

Payne Stewart, attired in plus-fours and a tam o'shanter hat was one of the most indomitable personalities in the game of golf.

He made history when he won his second U.S. Open sinking the longest putt ever to win the U.S. Open in the tournament's 105-year history.

As a member of the U.S. Ryder Cup team, he displayed his patriotism and pride for his country, and his sportsmanship in helping lead the U.S. team to victory.

Payne Stewart was more than just a role model to many aspiring athletes in the United States.

He truly recognized the joy of giving and making a difference in the lives of children.

He donated his winner's check from the 1987 Bay Hill Invitational to the Florida Hospital Circle of Friends to aid the families of cancer patients.

Just last year, Payne Stewart and his wife donated $500,000 to the first Foundation, the fundraising arm of the First Baptist Church of Orlando, to be used for the expansion of a Christian school.

In the most recent years of his life, Payne Stewart devoted his life to his family and his faith in God.

Payne Stewart's love for America was a great credit to the game of golf and to our country.

I urge my colleagues to join me in extending the House of Representatives' deepest condolences to Payne Stewart's family, and to the families of Robert Fraley, Van Arden, Michael Kling, Stephanie Bellegarrigue, and Bruce Borland.

Mr. MILLER of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. GIBBONS). The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Florida (Mr. MILLER of Florida) that the House suspend the rules and agree to the resolution, House Resolution 344.

The question was taken.

Mr. MILLER of Florida. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to clause 8 of rule XX and the Chair's prior announcement, further proceedings on this motion will be postponed.

EXPRESSING SENSE OF HOUSE THAT JOSEPH JEFFERSON ''SHOELESS JOE'' JACKSON BE APPROPRIATELY HONORED FOR OUTSTANDING BASEBALL ACCOMPLISHMENTS

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and agree to the resolution (H. Res. 269) expressing the sense of the House of Representatives that Joseph Jefferson ''Shoeless Joe'' Jackson should be appropriately honored for his outstanding baseball accomplishments.

The Clerk read as follows:

H. RES. 269

Whereas Joseph Jefferson ''Shoeless Joe'' Jackson, a native of Greenville, South Carolina, and a local legend, began his professional career and received his nickname while playing baseball for the Greenville Spinners in 1908;

Whereas ''Shoeless Joe'' Jackson moved to the Philadelphia Athletics for his major league debut in 1908, to Cleveland in 1910, and to the Chicago White Sox in 1915;

Whereas ''Shoeless Joe'' Jackson's accomplishments throughout his 13-year career in professional baseball were outstanding—he was one of only seven Major League Baseball players to ever top the coveted mark of a .400 batting average for a season, and he earned a lifetime batting average of .356, the third highest of all time;

Whereas ''Shoeless Joe'' Jackson's career record makes him one of our Nation's top baseball players of all time;

Whereas in 1919, the infamous ''Black Sox'' scandal erupted when an employee of a New York gambler allegedly bribed eight players of the Chicago White Sox, including Joseph Jefferson ''Shoeless Joe'' Jackson, to throw the first and second games of the 1919 World Series to the Cincinnati Reds;

Whereas in September 1920, a criminal court acquitted ''Shoeless Joe'' Jackson of the charge that he conspired to throw the 1919 World Series;

Whereas despite the acquittal, Judge Kenesaw Mountain Landis, baseball's first commissioner, banned ''Shoeless Joe'' Jackson from playing Major League Baseball for life without conducting any investigation of Jackson's alleged activities, issuing a summary punishment that fell far short of due process standards;

Whereas the evidence shows that Jackson did not deliberately misplay during the 1919 World Series in an attempt to make his team lose the World Series;

Whereas during the 1919 World Series, Jackson's play was outstanding—his batting average was .375 (the highest of any player from either team), he set a World Series record with 12 hits, he committed no errors, and he hit the only home run of the series;

Whereas because of his lifetime ban from Major League Baseball, ''Shoeless Joe'' Jackson has been excluded from consideration for admission to the Major League Baseball Hall of Fame;

Whereas ''Shoeless Joe'' Jackson died in 1951, and 80 years have elapsed since the 1919 World Series scandal erupted;

Whereas recently, Major League Baseball Commissioner Bud Selig took an important first step toward restoring the reputation of ''Shoeless Joe'' Jackson by agreeing to investigate whether he was involved in a conspiracy to alter the outcome of the 1919 World Series and whether he should be eligible for inclusion in the Major League Baseball Hall of Fame; and

Whereas it is appropriate for Major League Baseball to remove the taint upon the memory of ''Shoeless Joe'' Jackson and honor his outstanding baseball accomplishments: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of the House of Representatives that Joseph Jefferson ''Shoeless Joe'' Jackson should be appropriately honored for his outstanding baseball accomplishments.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to the rule, the gentleman from Nebraska (Mr. TERRY) and the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. CUMMINGS) will each control 20 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Nebraska (Mr. TERRY).

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on this legislation, House Resolution 269.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nebraska?

There was no objection.

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of House Resolution 269. I would like to thank my distinguished colleagues from South Carolina, the delegation, for their interest in American baseball history and their sense of justice in attempting to restore Shoeless Joe Jackson's place that his performance on the field earned him.

I would also like to thank the chairman of the Committee on Government Reform, who recognized the timeliness of this measure and expedited this opportunity for consideration before the House today.

The resolution is presented 80 years after the World Series in which the Chicago White Sox lost to the Cincinnati Redlegs. During that series, Joe Jackson had the highest batting average on either team, set a World Series record by collecting 12 hits, including the only home run on either team, and was not charged with a single error on the field.

Shoeless Joe Jackson remains an American icon, a perennial symbol of a young man who unknowingly became involved in the intrigues that surrounded his activities. On the field, Shoeless Joe Jackson's records speak for themselves. Only Ty Cobb and Rogers Hornsby's surpassed his .356 lifetime batting average. His 13-year career with the Philadelphia Athletics and the Chicago White Sox provided a background of consistent accomplishments.

Shoeless Joe Jackson was never convicted of a crime. In fact, found not guilty. Nevertheless, when Judge Kenesaw Mountain Landis became Commissioner of Baseball, he used Shoeless Joe Jackson and his seven teammates to demonstrate the firmness of his commitment to the integrity in our national pastime. He imposed a lifetime ban from baseball where the courts could not act.

Shoeless Joe Jackson died in 1951, having endured more than 30 years the exile that baseball imposed upon him. His records remain on the books and his level of accomplishments far exceed the feats that earn today's baseball players millions of dollars.

Americans are people whose fairness can allow them to recognize these great accomplishments without in any way compromising the standards of excellence and integrity that we must demand at the highest levels of any profession. Shoeless Joe Jackson has earned a place among the immortals of the baseball world, and this resolution provides a fitting opportunity for this House to remember the accomplishments of his excellent career.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, it is interesting to hear the tales that have been spun about Shoeless Joe Jackson. Called one of the saddest figures ever to play baseball, Joe Jackson was reported to be an illiterate country boy who only knew how to play baseball.

As it turns out, Joe Jackson died a successful businessman at age 61, earning between $50,000 to $100,000 a year. During an interview, Jackson is quoted as saying, ''All the big sports writers seemed to enjoy writing about me as an ignorant cotton-mill boy with nothing but lead where my brains ought to be. That was fine with me. I was able to fool a lot of pitchers and managers and club owners I wouldn't have been able to fool if they'd thought I was smarter.''

How and why Shoeless Joe Jackson got his name is exaggerated. One day, after getting blisters from his new baseball cleats, Jackson played one game in his stocking feet. One game. Not a season and not because he could not afford to buy cleats, as is widely reported.

Then, there is the well-known refrain, ''Say it ain't so, Joe,'' that supposedly took place after Jackson was arrested for conspiring to throw the 1919 World Series. As the story goes, a boy approached Joe and pleaded, ''Say it ain't so Joe,'' and Joe replied, ''Yes, kid, I'm afraid it is.'' As Jackson would later tell it, that tale is just that. There was no kid, and no arrest. Charlie Owens, a reporter with the Chicago Daily Times made the story up and published it.

What is the truth about Joe Jackson? He was a rising baseball star until he was banned from baseball for allegedly participating in the 1919 Chicago White Sox gambling scandal. In 1921, Jackson was acquitted of all charges and left the courtroom an innocent man. However, despite three attempts by his home State of South Carolina, Joe Jackson was never reinstated.

The only interview Joe Jackson conducted regarding the Chicago White Sox scandal was in the 1949 edition of Sport Magazine. In the article, entitled ''This Is the Truth,'' Joe Jackson maintains his innocence and states, ''I have never made any request to be reinstated in baseball, and I have never made any campaign to have my name cleared in the baseball records. This is not a plea of any kind. This is just my story. I am telling it simply because it seems 30 years after the World Series, the world may want to hear what I have to say.'' He goes on to say, ''Baseball failed to keep faith with me. When I got notice of my suspension 3 days after the 1920 season, it read that if found innocent of any wrongdoing, I would be reinstated. If found guilty, I would be banned for life. I was found innocent, and I was still banned for life.'' It would seem that you are innocent until proven guilty in a court of law, but not in baseball.

The South Carolina delegation recently sent a letter to baseball commissioner Alan Selig to have outfielder Joe Jackson posthumously reinstated. They have also introduced this resolution, expressing the sense of the House to appropriately honor Joseph Jefferson Jackson. I urge my colleagues to join me and the South Carolina delegation in supporting this resolution. It is time for the truth to be told.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. DEMINT), the author of this resolution.

Mr. DEMINT. Mr. Speaker, I thank both gentlemen for their wonderful remarks.

Mr. Speaker, some might ask why, with all the important issues, problems, and challenges that this Congress faces, why consider and vote on a resolution about a man who played baseball 80 years ago and who has been dead almost 50 years? Why is he important to me today and why should he deserve the attention of the American people today?

I am speaking of Joseph Jefferson Jackson, Shoeless Joe to those who are familiar with baseball. He is important because he is here today in spirit asking for justice. America has learned the hard lesson that when injustice can prevail upon one of us, it is a threat to all of us. So our consideration today is not only about injustice against one man, it is about protecting justice for everyone.

And while we believe that our efforts today will be good for baseball, America's favorite pastime, we are equally convinced that our efforts will protect the American Dream, the dream that even the poorest American, with hard work, can end up at the top of the world.

Shoeless Joe worked his way from being a poor, illiterate mill worker, which is where he started, to becoming one of the best baseball players of all time. No one who has lived that American dream and achieved so much should be stripped of his honor and his dignity and his livelihood without due process, even without a hearing. When this can happen to one of us, it can happen to any one of us.

Mr. Speaker, I introduced House Resolution 269, along with the entire South Carolina delegation, earlier this summer. This resolution simply states that Shoeless Joe Jackson should be appropriately honored for his outstanding baseball accomplishments. This resolution has gathered broad support from both political parties. It is fitting that even in the tension of these last days in Congress that we pause and find common ground in paying tribute to a hero of our great national pastime.

While there are important issues to consider and to complete before we finish Congress' session, it is worthy of this body to take a few minutes to stand up for fairness and to right an old wrong by honoring a baseball legend. As most baseball fans know, Shoeless Joe Jackson was one of the greatest baseball players ever to play the game.

The people of my district are very familiar with Shoeless Joe, since he grew up playing baseball in the mill leagues in Greenville, and he spent the last part of his life in that city as well.

While he could not read or write early, and he only learned to sign his name later in life, as has already been pointed out, Shoeless Joe was very smart, in addition to being a great baseball player. Throughout his life he never tired of teaching kids to play the game he loved. There is even a baseball park named after him in Greenville where kids play his game today. There is also a revitalization effort in a poor neighborhood in my town named in his memory to improve everyone's life there. And if anyone would like to see some of his memorabilia, we have some pictures and other information in my office.

Those unfamiliar with Shoeless Joe have heard some of the facts, but let me recount some of his amazing accomplishments. Of his hitting, Babe Ruth once said, ''I decided to pick out one of the greatest hitters to watch and to study, and Jackson was good enough for me.'' Joe Jackson batted .408 his rookie year, a feat which has never been equaled. He has the third highest batting average of all time, behind only Ty Cobb and Roger Hornsby's .689. Over a 10-year period, he never hit below 300.

His fielding skills in the outfield were legendary, and his glove was named ''the place where triples go to die.''

Unfortunately, while these are Hall of Fame numbers, Shoeless Joe is not in the baseball Hall of Fame. His bat is there. His uniform is there. His shoes are there. But he is not. This is because, in 1920, ''Shoeless'' Joe was banned from playing baseball for life by the Commissioner for allegations that he took part in the infamous ''Black Sox'' scandal, allegedly throwing the 1919 World Series. In that Series, a group of New York gamblers bribed a number of players on the Chicago White Sox to throw the Series to Cincinnati.

When the news came out in 1920, the new Commissioner of Baseball, Commissioner Landis, acted swiftly. In a summary judgment, without an investigation, the Commissioner banned 8 players on the White Sox from ever playing Major League baseball again. ''Shoeless'' Joe was included in the ban.

While he insisted on his innocence all the way to his death bed, ''Shoeless'' Joe served out his sentence with dignity and honor and without rancor.

Recently, a number of baseball heroes, including Ted Williams, Bob Feller, and Tommy LaSorda have taken up the cause of restoring the honor of ''Shoeless'' Joe. This is a cause that has long been championed in ''Shoeless'' Joe's hometown of Greenville.

I had a chance this morning to talk with Ted Williams myself. What a thrill. He said he will continue to fight for ''Shoeless'' Joe until his last day, and he thanked all of us in Congress who are going to bat for Joe today.

I am not going to debate whether or not the Commissioner's verdict was the right thing to do. He made his decision and never reviewed it, despite the fact that Jackson was acquitted of participating in the fix twice, once in 1920 by a friendly Chicago jury, and once in 1924 by an impartial jury in Milwaukee.

In fact, the jurors in Milwaukee were asked in a special interrogatory whether ''Shoeless'' Joe had conspired or participated in the fix of the Series. The answer was an emphatic no.

I am also not going to debate if Jackson was given money. According to the story, ''Shoeless'' Joe's roommate, Lefty Williams, left $5,000 for Jackson on his bed. Whatever the debate, four things are clear.

First, ''Shoeless'' Joe tried to give the money back before the Series started but was rebuffed.

Second, ''Shoeless'' Joe tried to inform the owner of the White Sox of the fix, but the owner refused to see him.

Third, ''Shoeless'' Joe offered to sit out the Series but was again rebuffed.

Fourth, and most notably, ''Shoeless'' Joe played to win. He led all players by hitting .375, and he had the only homerun in the Series. His fielding was flawless, throwing out several men at home plate. He set a World Series record with 12 hits, and he combined with Buck Weaver, the other player who was unfairly punished, for 13 hits, a record that stood for 60 years.

I have no doubt of ''Shoeless'' Joe's innocence. In the end, he proved his innocence in the only way he could, with his bat and glove.

For my colleagues' information, Fox News did an excellent two-part review of the case just a month ago. I have a copy of the tape if anyone would like to see it.

In July, Ted Williams, Tommy LaSorda, and Bob Feller filed a petition with Commissioner Selig. That petition does not ask Major League Baseball to exonerate ''Shoeless'' Joe or even to endorse his candidacy in the Hall of Fame. To quote the petition: ''Those issues are moot as he served a very difficult sentence over a long period. The Commissioner of Baseball is merely asked to acknowledge that 'Shoeless' Joe has fully paid his debt to society and to the game, that he satisfied the sentence of the first Commissioner with dignity and humility and without rancor. Because he has fulfilled his sentence, Baseball has no further call or jurisdiction over 'Shoeless' Joe.''

I believe this petition provides Major League Baseball with a graceful and dignified way to finally let the issue rest and to let ''Shoeless'' Joe receive the honor he has long deserved.

Today, the Mayor of Greenville, Knox White, added his support by sending to the Commissioner a petition with 10,000 names signed from my home district, all pleading with the Commissioner to give Joe his rightful due.

The resolution which I have placed before the House today on behalf of the people in my district and baseball fans everywhere simply states that ''Shoeless'' Joe Jackson should be appropriately honored for his outstanding baseball accomplishments. Commissioner Selig has agreed to review the matter, and I have been following the review process carefully.

I appreciate the Commissioner's willingness to review this matter, and I understand a decision is imminent. I am absolutely confident that a fair and impartial review will result in ''Shoeless'' Joe finally being allowed to receive the honor he has long deserved and which he displayed throughout his life.

Mr. Speaker, on his death bed, ''Shoeless'' Joe said, ''I am about to meet the biggest umpire of them all, and he knows I'm innocent.''

Fifty years after his death and 80 years after the infamous Series, and after the most unfair judgment, it is time for Baseball to right a wrong and restore the honor of a good man.

I was born in Greenville, South Carolina, the same year ''Shoeless'' Joe died just about a mile from where he died. I am glad to be a small part in this process today, and I hope all of my colleagues will join me in supporting this resolution.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. DEMINT) for his comments in shedding additional light on the life of ''Shoeless'' Joe Jackson.

I think the thing that comes through clearly, Mr. Speaker, is that the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. DEMINT) and the South Carolina delegation and many others merely want to right a wrong and give someone their due.

And clearly, ''Shoeless'' Joe Jackson has earned, has earned, the right to be appropriately honored as the resolution states.

So I want to thank the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. DEMINT) and I want to thank the South Carolina delegation because I think what we are attempting to do here today sends a clear message that, when we see wrong, we will do what we can to right it. It may be many, many years later, but we can bet our bottom dollar that there is someone who is looking at what we are doing and saying that they admire us for taking up the time, we can be doing a whole lot other things, but they are taking up the time to make sure that a wrong is made right.

And so, with that, I want to thank the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. BURTON), chairman of our committee, and the gentleman from California (Mr.

WAXMAN), our ranking member, and I want to thank the gentleman from Nebraska (Mr. TERRY), and I want to thank certainly the gentleman from Florida (Mr. SCARBOROUGH) in his absence, the chairman of our subcommittee.

The fact is that I think that this is a very, very good resolution. I urge all of my colleagues to vote in favor of it.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself the balance of my time.

Mr. Speaker, House Resolution 269 provides a fitting commemoration of his accomplishments as a professional baseball player. We applaud the stellar performance of Joseph Jefferson Jackson on the field and call upon all Americans to recognize his 13 years of excellence.

In a generous spirit, we encourage professional Baseball to provide ''Shoeless'' Joe Jackson the honors he fully deserves.

I ask the full support of all Members of this resolution.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. GIBBONS). The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Nebraska (Mr. TERRY) that the House suspend the rules and agree to the resolution, H. Res. 269.

The question was taken; and (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ONGOING DISCUSSIONS ON SOCIAL SECURITY

(Mr. SMITH of Michigan asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, a very brief comment regarding our future on social security.

We have approximately eight proposals now introduced that have been scored by the Social Security Administration to keep social security solvent for at least the next 75 years. As we move forward in these last several days, and as we break for the rest of November and into December, I would suggest very strongly that each Member of the Congress meet with the people back home, talk to them about the importance of social security, about the complications of solving social security, and about our efforts to have a good beginning by not spending the social security surplus.

To accommodate $9 trillion of unfunded liability, $9 trillion that needs to be accommodated in order to keep social security going, it is very important that these discussions continue.

TRIBUTE TO SERGEANT RICKY TIMBROOK

(Mr. WOLF asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. WOLF. Mr. Speaker, I want to pay tribute today to a young man who was a policeman in Winchester, Virginia, which is in my district, who was shot and killed on Friday night, October 29. Sergeant Ricky Timbrook was killed as he was chasing a suspect down the street.

Sergeant Timbrook's death has shocked and saddened the entire northern Shenandoah Valley. More than 3,000 people attended his funeral last Thursday, many of whom were law enforcement officers from all over the area and around the country. According to news reports, he may be the first Winchester police officer to have been shot and killed in the line of duty.

Ricky was 32 years old. He and his wife Kelly had just completed the construction of a new home. They were expecting their first child, a boy, who is due on Christmas Day.

He joined the Winchester Police Department almost 8 years ago. Just over a year ago, he was promoted to sergeant in charge of a brand-new department, the Special Enforcement Team.

I want to extend my deepest condolences to Sergeant Timbrook's family as we pay tribute to him and to law enforcement officers and their families everywhere who routinely go into harm's way to protect us.

My father was a police officer on the streets of Philadelphia and I know the worry a police officer's family can feel when a husband, father, brother, or son goes out the door each day to begin their tour of duty.

According to the National Law Enforcement Officers Memorial Fund, more than 14,000 officers have died while performing their duties. On average, one law enforcement officer is killed somewhere in America every other day, and an average of 160 officers die in the line of duty every year.

Mr. Speaker, I include for the RECORD an obituary about Sergeant Timbrook and an editorial which appeared in the Winchester Star November 2, 1999, as follows:

[From The Winchester Star, Nov. 2, 1999]

IN THE LINE OF DUTY—IN POLICEMAN'S DEATH, ALL ARE DIMINISHED

It says something about the quality of life here in the northern Valley that, before the horrific events of last Friday night, it had been more than 60 years since a local law enforcement officer had fallen in the line of duty. However, it also says something about today's society that even here, in our largely peaceful corner of the world, violence can erupt and snatch from us the life of a fine young officer.

The slaying of Sgt. Ricky Lee Timbrook should prompt us to pause and reflect not merely on the utter fragility of our worldly existence, but on the tenuous line on which our social contract rests. The primary reason people, down through the ages, have formed communities is for reasons of mutual comfort and security. This contract, of course, entails a provision for public protection—i.e. the police. The presence of the men and women ensured with that protection—the fabled ''thin blue line''—quietly assures us that the social contract is being enforced.

Thus, when one of these officers—one of these men and women who take an oath ''to serve and protect'' us—falls in the performance of this essential duty, we as a community feel it. First and foremost, of course, we feel for the man himself, because we know he died so that we might live free from the worries daily addressed by our men and women in blue. And, to be sure, we feel for his loved ones—particularly a baby, yet unborn, who will never know its father—and for his fellow officers, to whom the awful knowledge is hammered home anew that they live on the proverbial edge, that violence awaits their kind with every routine call, that death walks closer to them than to the rest of us.

However, our tranquility, too, is shattered, in the knowledge that one of the exemplary people we pay to step forward and protect us has been taken from our midst. We grieve because Ricky Timbrook no longer rides in his patrol car through our streets, and no longer walks the streets of this town.

By all accounts, Sgt. Timbrook was a fine policeman, but an even better man, one to whom we confidently entrusted our security. We at The Star knew him not only in his role as a crimefigther, but also as the schools' DARE officer, the crew-cut policeman who one day, two years ago, posed happily for a photo with the winner of DARE program's annual essay contest. Others, of course, knew him better—as husband, son, brother, friend, and comrade.

And so, in his untimely death, we are all diminished—and immeasurably saddened.

SERGEANT RICKY L. TIMBROOK

Ricky Lee Timbrook, age 32, of 2876 Sheffield Court, Winchester, Virginia died Saturday, October 30, 1999 in the Winchester Medical Center.

Mr. Timbrook was born October 5, 1967 in Winchester, Virginia, the son of Richard Timbrook and Kitty Stotler Timbrook of Bloomery, West Virginia. He was a sergeant with the Winchester Police Department where he had been employed for eight years. He attended the Grace Evangelical Lutheran Church of Winchester and was a member of the Winchester Fraternal Order of Police Lodge. He was a graduate of Fairmont State College where he received a Bachelor of Business degree in Criminal Justice.

Mr. Timbrook married Kelly L. Wisecarver on July 27, 1997 in Winchester, Virginia.

Surviving with his wife and parents, is a sister, Kimberly Hundson of Capon Bridge, West Virginia.

A funeral service will be conducted at 11:00 a.m. on Thursday, November 4, 1999 at Sacred Heart of Jesus Catholic Church in Winchester with the Pastor James H. Utt, Pastor Jeffrey D. May officiating. Interment will be in Mount Hebron Cemetery.

Pallbearers will be Kevin Bowers, Matthew Sirbaugh, Robert Ficik, Frank Pearson, Julian Berger and Alex Beeman.

The family will receive friends at Omps Funeral Home on Wednesday evening from 7:00 p.m. until 9:00 p.m.

Memorial contributions may be made to the Ricky L. Timbrook Children's Outreach Fund, c/o Chief Gary W. Reynolds, 126 N. Cameron Street, Winchester, Virginia 22601.

SPECIAL ORDERS

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. GIBBONS). Under the Speaker's announced policy of January 6, 1999, and under a previous order of the House, the following Members will be recognized for 5 minutes each.

CALLING FOR IMPROVEMENT IN MATH AND SCIENCE EDUCATION IN AMERICA

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. EHLERS) is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. EHLERS. Mr. Speaker, I rise this evening to discuss the issue of education and mathematics and science in our Nation. I have deep concerns about the current status of math and science education in this Nation.

First of all, I believe currently it is inadequate. I say this for several reasons. Mr. Speaker, as I was stating, the Third International Mathematics and Science Study, which was conducted a few years ago, indicated that we were near the bottom of those nations and developed countries teaching mathematics and science in their high schools, near the bottom.

Some say, well, it is not so bad, we were not that far below the others. I say it is terrible. With the resources that this country has and with the high quality of students this Nation has, it is inexcusable for us to be near the bottom, or at the bottom. We should be not only at the top, but far and away the best Nation in this world in terms of our educational effort.

Mr. Speaker, the second reason I say we are not doing well in mathematics and science education is simply by looking at the tests administered by the States. When we look at these tests and look at the test scores, we find that in reading a typical average for a State might be in the seventies, and for some of the other subjects in that area, and for science we are down in the 30 percent, even for some of the better States, and as low as 10 percent in some of the others. These are not passing grades and they never have been in our school system. We must improve.

A third indication that we are not doing the job well is that we do not have enough engineers and scientists to do the job in this country. How do I know? Because we issue H(1)(b) visas every year to allow scientists and engineers from other countries to emigrate into this country to help us out. Annually, it is in the neighborhood of 100,000 each, and usually that quota is used up well before the end of the year. We are importing scientists and engineers, asking them to emigrate to this country for this purpose. Clearly, we are not producing enough of our own.

The final indication that we are not doing the job with math and science education in our K through 12 system is that when we visit our grad schools, graduate education in mathematics, science, and engineering, we find that, in general, over half of the students are from other countries. Our students are not able to compete for grad school entrance with students of other nations.

I think we have to improve our math and science education. Why? For the reasons I gave above, but also because, first of all, we have to make sure we have enough scientists and engineers in this country so that we can keep our economic growth strong and meet the needs of our citizens.

There are other reasons as well. It is not just producing good scientists and engineers, but a second main reason is what I call workplace readiness. We have reached the point in our society and in many developed nations that you literally cannot find a good job unless you have a good grounding in math and science.

It is going to get worse. I have made predictions on this floor that in 20 years, it will be impossible to find a good job without a good foundation in math and science. I have to revise that, because last week I attended a talk at the Capitol here by John Chambers, CEO of CISCO Systems, an Internet company. It is clear to me that I have to revise my estimate downward and say in 10 years people will not be able to get a really good job without a good grounding in mathematics, science, engineer, and technology. So workplace readiness is another good reason.

The third reason is to simply produce better consumers and citizens of this Nation, people who understand math and science, so they can evaluate claims in the marketplace about health products or health supplements, or that they can vote better about projects that involve science and the environment, and that they can elect leaders who have shown that they understand these issues and will vote intelligently on issues involving math, science, technology, engineering, the environment, and so forth.

How are we going to improve math and science education? I think three major points: better teachers, or better trained teachers, I should say; better curricula; and improved methods of teaching science.

I will take just a minute to discuss each of those. I will address those later in more detail in another talk. We have to make sure we recruit good teachers, because we are not recruiting enough today, we have to make sure they are trained properly, and we have to keep them. We have to make sure they do not get discouraged. We have to help them get the job done in the classroom.

We have to improve our science curricula. Right now it is a hodgepodge. Recently the American Association for the Advancement of Science studied middle school curricula. Every middle school science curriculum in the United States was judged to be inadequate, every single one. The only one that was regarded as acceptable, and mildly acceptable, was one put out by Michigan State University, and that is only a partial curriculum.

The final point is methodology. We have to improve our way, our methods of teaching science. As I said, I will address these issues in a later talk.

TRIBUTE TO FIVE U.S. SOLDIERS WHO DIED IN THE PLANE CRASH OF JULY 23, 1999, IN COLOMBIA

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Texas (Mr. REYES) is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. REYES. Mr. Speaker, on July 23 a U.S. Army reconnaissance plane on a counterdrug mission crashed in the jungles of Colombia. It killed all on board. There were five U.S. Army soldiers and two Colombian air crewmen on this aircraft.

During this week, when we honor our Nation's veterans, I wanted to pay tribute to the five U.S. soldiers who died in that crash. These five individuals were husbands, a wife, parents, and children. They have paid the ultimate sacrifice for this Nation, and we must not forget what their families have sacrificed, as well.

The five soldiers whom we honor tonight were part of a special military intelligence battalion, the 204th, which recently moved from Panama and Florida to Fort Bliss, which is located in my district. They were flying a reconnaissance mission over Colombia in a specially-equipped aircraft.

The first soldier was Captain Jennifer Odom. The pilot of the ARL, the aircraft which crashed in Colombia was Captain Jennifer Odom. She was born in Frederick, Maryland, in 1970, and graduated from West Point in 1992. After graduating from flight school, Captain Odom spent 2 years in Stuttgart, Germany, flying senior ranking government officials and general officers throughout Europe.

After completing her military intelligence training, she joined the 204th MI battalion as an executive officer of D company. She was scheduled to take command of D Company in August. Captain Odom was an experienced pilot, having flown well over 2,000 hours in military aircraft, including 300 hours as a pilot in command of this particular aircraft.

She leaves her husband, Charles Odom, and her two children, Charles, age 15, and Daniel, age 11.

The other officer on the aircraft was Captain Jose Anthony Santiago. Captain Santiago was born in New York City in 1962. He enlisted in the Army in 1984, and after 7 years, was commissioned as an air defense artillery officer. He later moved into military intelligence and excelled in every aspect of the job. In light of his accomplishment, the battalion commander selected Captain Santiago to command the Headquarters and Service Company of the 204th.

During the past year, his company has done an excellent job in supporting six deployments in South America. Captain Santiago was also a senior army parachutist and a jump master. He is survived by his wife Cynthia and his two children, Christiana and Laura.

Along with Captain Odom, Chief Warrant Officer 2 Thomas G. Moore was the second pilot in the aircraft. CW2 Moore was born in Englewood, California, in 1967. He joined the Army in 1988 after attending the U.S. Army Air Force Academy.

After serving as a Bradley fighting vehicle commander during Desert Storm, CW2 Moore was selected for the warrant officer training program and attended army flight school. He served with the 204th MI battalion since 1996. CW2 Thomas Moore was married to Rebecca, and survived by two children, Matthew and Emily.

The fourth soldier whom we honor tonight is specialist Timothy Bruce Cluff. Specialist Cluff was born in Mesa, Arizona. During high school he achieved the high range of Eagle Scout in the Boy Scouts of America.

In 1997, he enlisted in the Army, and it was apparent almost immediately that he would be an outstanding soldier. Specialist Cluff proved to be a highly skilled analyst and was selected as a mission supervisor based on his exemplary performance. This outstanding soldier is survived by his wife, Meggin, and his two young children, Maciah and Ryker. Meggin is also today expecting her third child.

The last soldier was specialist Ray E. Krueger II. Specialist Krueger was born in Leavenworth, Kansas, and graduated from The Colony High School. Krueger was an outstanding soldier in many ways. For example, this young man not only excelled as a crew member in the aircraft, but he also scored the highest possible level on the Army's physical fitness test, and qualified as an expert with the M–16 rifle.

Specialist Krueger leaves his wife, Briana Krueger, who was also assigned to the 204th MI battalion, and who recently has left the Army to return to civilian life.

Tonight I want the husbands, wives, children, and parents of these brave soldiers to know that we in Congress are thinking of them, and we want to thank them for the sacrifices which they have made for this country. God bless each and every one of them: Captain Odom, Captain Santiago, Chief Warrant Officer Moore, Specialist Cluff, and Specialist Krueger.

This country owes them all the gratitude, especially during this week when we celebrate and pay tribute to our veterans.

U.S. TRADE POLICIES WITH RESPECT TO AGRICULTURE HARM U.S. FARMERS AND RANCHERS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Idaho (Mr. SIMPSON) is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. Speaker, the U.S. economy is strong, with unemployment low, interest rates low, inflation low, the Dow and the NASDAQ outperforming our wildest expectations.

In spite of this strong economy, there is one sector of our economy which is in a depressed state and has been in a depressed state for the last 3 years. That is agriculture. For a variety of reasons, agriculture is suffering. Whether it is the Asian financial crisis, the strong dollar, the regulatory burdens that we place on our farmers, all of these things are adding to the crisis in agriculture.

Yet, there is one thing that is adding to it even more than these. That is the U.S.'s trade policies as they relate to agriculture, that have left agricultural producers at a competitive disadvantage to our counterparts in other countries.

U.S. farmers know that we need trade agreements. In fact, one out of every 3 acres in the United States is produced for export. We have to have trade agreements, but trade agreements for trade agreements' sake are unacceptable. We have to have fair trade agreements. Trade agreements that leave our farmers and ranchers at a disadvantage, as they have in the past, are not fair.

This is not a partisan issue. This has been a bipartisan failure on the part of administrations to negotiate fair trade agreements for our farmers and ranchers. Over 80 percent of the world's export subsidies are employed by the European Union. This is unfair. World trade tariffs average 50 percent, while in the United States, they average 10 percent. This is unfair.

That is why the upcoming WTO ministerial rounds that take place later this month and early in December in Seattle are so important to agriculture. I was pleased to be a co-chair and am pleased to be a co-chair with the gentleman from North Dakota (Mr. POMEROY), Senator DORGAN of North Dakota, and Senator CRAIG of Idaho, to chair the WTO trade caucus for ranchers and farmers.

We have over 50 of this caucus, Members of both parties, Members of the House and Senate, that have been meeting for the last several weeks trying to decide what the priorities of this Congress are that we must address in Seattle. We have met among ourselves and discussed these issues. We have met with producer groups to discuss the issues, to identify those things that are important, that we must address during the upcoming rounds of the WTO negotiations.

Several of those things we have developed, and let me go through some of the important issues that we think must be addressed during this round of the WTO.

Market access. We have to expand market access through tariff reduction or elimination. Export subsidies need to be eliminated. We need to reduce the European subsidies to a level provided by the United States before applying any formula reductions. In the past, the European Union has higher subsidies than the United States and our negotiations have reduced them proportionally. But when one group has a high tariff or subsidy level and another has a lower and they are reduced proportionally, America is still left at a competitive disadvantage. We must bring those to a level playing field before any formula reductions.

We must have no unilateral disarmament when it comes to agriculture. We have to combat unfair trade practices and restore and strengthen enforcement tools against them. We have to improve the enforcement of the WTO dispute panel decisions. Currently when those decisions are made, there are times when our competitors will not abide by the dispute resolution.

We have to support family farms. Preserve the flexibility to assist team farmers through income assistance, crop insurance and other programs that do not distort trade. We have to retain the full complement of nontrade distorting export tools including export credit guarantees, international food assistance, and market development programs. We have to be sure and establish disciplines on State trading enterprises to make them as transparent as the United States' marketing system is.

And nontariff trade barriers, we have to ensure that science and risk assessment principles established by the Sanitary and Phytosanitary Accord during the Uruguay Round are the basis for measures applied to products of new technology and that this process is transparent. We also have to negotiate improved market access for products of new technology including bioengineered products.

Mr. Speaker, we have met with our U.S. Trade Ambassador Charlene Barshevsky and our Secretary of Agriculture Dan Glickman and I am pleased to report that the administration has told us that their highest priority in the upcoming round is agriculture. And, in fact, when they look at their priorities and place them against ours, they almost mirror the importance of the priorities that we have.

So I am pleased that the administration is taking agriculture as an important negotiation during this WTO round that will start in Seattle. We cannot leave this round of the WTO with ag at a competitive disadvantage.

NAFTA PRESENTS ITS OWN Y2K PROBLEM

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. LIPINSKI) is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. LIPINSKI. Mr. Speaker, I rise to continue the litany of charges against NAFTA. As we face the end of the millennium, NAFTA presents its own Y2K problem: January 1, 2000, crossborder trucking provisions of NAFTA are expected to allow Mexican trucks to enter free and clear into the United States. A close look into the situation makes NAFTA's Y2K problem quite upsetting.

At a recent National Transportation Safety Board hearing on this issue, Mexico refused to send a representative. Canadian and American representatives appeared, but Mexico was a no-show.

Well, if they happen to have come to this meeting they would have learned how far they are behind Canada and the United States in oversight and regulations.

Does Mexico have log books? No. Does Mexico have vehicle maintenance standards? No. Does Mexico have roadside inspections? No. Does Mexico have safety rating systems? No. Does Mexico have medical certification of drivers? No.

Simply put, Mexico does not have any oversight of their trucking industry, yet they want the United States to allow their unregulated, unsafe Mexican trucks which weigh up to 106,000 pounds, well over the U.S. limit of 80,000 pounds, to barrel down our highways and byways. In fact, the reason they did not send a representative is that they are upset that President Clinton dare hint that he will not allow Mexican trucks into the USA as of January 1.

Well, Mr. Speaker, Mexico is upset that we will not let their mammoth 106,000-pound unsafe trucks and unsafe drivers into the USA. I say unsafe because of the less than 1 percent of Mexican trucks and Mexican drivers inspected at the border, over 40 percent have failed inspections and were placed out of service. In addition, according to a new report from the Department of Transportation's Inspector General, over 250 Mexican motor carriers have traveled illegally beyond the NAFTA border zone. Therefore, Mexican trucks and drivers have proved to be unsafe lawbreakers.

The Inspector General concluded in his report that, ''Adequate mechanisms are not in place to control access of Mexico-domiciled motor carriers into the United States.'' To ensure that Mexican motor carriers comply with U.S. statutes, the Inspector General suggested that, among other methods, fines should be increased for illegal activities. Well, Mr. Speaker, under a House-passed bill, we have done just that.

H.R. 2679, the Motor Carrier Safety Act, increases fines up to $10,000 and a possible disqualification for a first-time offense, and up to $25,000 with a 6-month disqualification for a second offense.

The previous fine was only $500 to $1,000 and even the Inspector General stated as such, motor carriers are likely to consider the fines to be simply a cost of doing business.

Hopefully, the Senate will take up the measure that includes the House-passed provisions so that Mexican trucks cannot regard the now measly penalty as a cost of just doing business.

Of course, Mexico is not happy about the increased fines and they and others claim that this is a violation of NAFTA. Excuse me, Mr. Speaker, but since when is a fine of illegal activities a violation of anything? Mexico violates our laws and they say we violate NAFTA?

Clearly, Mexican trucks should not be allowed into the U.S. and President Clinton was right in telling the teamsters that he will not open the borders to Mexican trucks come January 1. Well, that might be the first right move President Clinton has made regarding NAFTA. He can make another right move by starting the process of withdrawing from NAFTA altogether. Until then, the horrors of Mexican trucks will just be another in the long litany of NAFTA injustices to the United States of America and to its citizens.

PRESIDENT SHOULD NOT GRANT CLEMENCY FOR LEONARD PELTIER

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. OXLEY) is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. OXLEY. Mr. Speaker, the month of November has been designated Native American Heritage Month, a time in which to honor the positive contributions of our Nation's earlier inhabitants. I was disturbed to learn then that November has already been designated Leonard Peltier Freedom Month by a group pressing for his release from Leavenworth Federal Penitentiary.

Because of the publicity surrounding this case, we should all be familiar with its details: Leonard Peltier is serving two consecutive life sentences for the cold-blooded murder of two FBI agents on South Dakota's Pine Ridge Indian Reservation in 1975. But it is important that we review the facts of the case separating them from the myths that have arisen over the years, especially as Peltier's supporters are petitioning the White House for clemency for this convicted killer.

On June 26, 1975, FBI Special Agents Ronald A. Williams and Jack R. Coler entered the Jumping Bull Compound of the Pine Ridge Reservation pursuing a man in connection with an assault on two young ranchers in nearby Manderson, South Dakota.

One of the three people in the vehicle the agents were pursuing was Leonard Peltier, a fugitive from justice wanted for the attempted murder of a police officer in Milwaukee. Peltier and his associates stopped their vehicle abruptly and opened fire on the two agents. Surprised, outmanned, and outgunned, Agents Williams and Coler were severely wounded in this barrage of gunfire. Agent Coler was hit in the right arm, the force of the bullet nearly tearing it off. He fell unconscious within moments. Agent Williams, although hit in the left shoulder and right foot, tore off his own shirt in the midst of this chaos and fashioned a tourniquet around his partner's arm.

Ambushed, the two agents lay helpless, completely at the mercy of their assailants. Peltier and the other two gunmen, though, would not be showing any mercy to these law enforcement officers that day. They walked down to where the two agents lay dying after this horrendous assault. Agent Williams, kneeling on the ground with his hand out as if to surrender was shot directly in the face. He died instantly. Peltier's group turned on the still unconscious Agent Coler. They shot them twice in the head with a shotgun at close range and both men died instantly.

An examination of the crime scene revealed that Agents Williams and Coler were only able to fire five shots in defense. Peltier and his men by contrast left more than 125 bullet holes in the agent's vehicles.

After these vicious murders, Peltier fled the reservation and was put on the FBI's Ten Most Wanted List. Five months later, he was spotted hiding in an RV by a state trooper in Oregon. Peltier fired at the officer and fled once again. Investigators found Peltier's fingerprints on a bag underneath the RV's front seat. Inside the bag was Agent Coler's revolver, stolen from him in the bloodbath 5 months earlier.

Peltier escaped into Canada, where he was ultimately arrested by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. Confirming beyond a doubt his cold-blooded mentality, he said that if he had known that the officers were about to arrest him, he would have ''blown them out of their shoes.''

Mr. Speaker, those are not the words of a candidate for clemency. Leonard Peltier's heinous crimes are not the actions of a candidate for clemency. Yet Peltier's supporters are confident that the President will pardon this murderer, pointing to his pardon of the FALN terrorists earlier this year.

These supporters would have us believe that Peltier is being held unjustly, that he was framed because he is Native American. They have politicized the case, bringing in liberal Hollywood actors who glorify Peltier and refer to the slain agents, Williams and Coler, as ''faceless soldiers'' sent by the government. They have elevated this thug, calling him a leader of his people, further dishonoring the law enforcement officers he killed and dishonoring Native American heritage as well.

Our legal system has ruled again and again that Leonard Peltier is a killer. The Supreme Court refused to review his case, and a parole board ruled in 1993 that Peltier be denied parole for the next 15 years. FBI Director Louis Freeh is on record saying that ''[t]here should be no commutation of his two life terms in prison.''

In a recent letter to his supporters, Peltier makes reference to the ''many years'' of his life that have been ''stolen.'' To this day, he remains oblivious to the fact that he stole many years of life from the two agents he killed. Jack Coler was 28, Ron Williams was 27 and a father of a 4-year-old son. They were at the beginning of what promised to be long and successful careers in law enforcement. They were cut down at the prime of their lives by a coward who has shown no remorse.

Mr. Speaker, as my colleagues know, I was also a FBI special agent and I am appalled that Leonard Peltier has chosen to exploit Native Americans for his own selfish purposes. This is not about ethnicity, it is about murder. It is about respect for the law and law enforcement officers.

I call on the President to see through the myth that has built up around Leonard Peltier and recognize that Peltier is trying to manipulate emotions and use political issues to gain an undeserved release. The President owes at least that much to the families of these slaughtered heroes.

ADVANCING THE INTERESTS OF AMERICAN FAMILY FARMERS IN WTO TRADE NEGOTIATIONS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from North Dakota (Mr. POMEROY) is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. POMEROY. Mr. Speaker, I rise this evening as cochair of the WTO Trade Caucus for Farmers and Ranchers to discuss the importance of the upcoming ministerial talks in Seattle and the next round of multilateral trade negotiations.

Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be joined by my cochair, the gentleman from Idaho (Mr. SIMPSON) who presented earlier on this very topic. We also have across our membership in the task force a bipartisan, bicameral group of more than 50 members who are committed to advancing the interests of family farmers in trade negotiations.

The agriculture economy is in dire straits. American farmers are reeling from the twin evils of production loss caused by natural disasters and price collapse caused by depressed export sales and strong global production.

□ 1915

The crisis in agriculture demands a multifaceted response from Congress, ranging from emergency assistance, crop insurance reform, safety net reform, and expanding international trade. It is this last issue of expanding trade that I will discuss this evening.

Perhaps no sector of the American economy is any more dependent on trade than agriculture. The United States is the single largest exporter of ag products in the world. On average, the crops on one out of three acres in the United States are exported. Many commodities are even more dependent on foreign sales, such as wheat, 1 out of 2 acres is exported; sunflower oil, 3 out of 4 acres of which is exported. Given the share of farm income that depends on foreign markets, American farmers cannot succeed and prosper without robust export sales.

Now, unfortunately, the export market for agriculture has been anything but robust. In fact, the value of U.S. agriculture exports has fallen from $60 billion in 1996 to a projected $49 billion this year, a decline of nearly 20 percent.

Look at this chart. It tells a very sad tale. It is a small wonder we have had that incredible depression in our ag economy with the export record like that.

There are several reasons for the decline in export sales. They include the financial crisis in Asia. Despite signs of recovery, we continue to see sales lagging in this region, not rehabilitated to what they were prior to the crisis. Strong worldwide production has further depressed exports and, in turn, depressed the prices for our ag commodities.

In addition to these market forces, however, American farmers are on the losing end of export sales because of an unlevel playing field in the international market. Around the world, our American farmers are not just competing with farmers of other countries in other parts of the world relative to their own exports. We are competing against their governments as well as they subsidize unfairly their export market.

The crops grown by American farmers face, on average, a tariff rate of 50 percent in foreign markets compared to just 10 percent on what ag products face entering our market. With respect to export subsidies, the European Union accounts for 85 percent of world export subsidies.

Just take a look at my second chart this evening. The blue reflects European exports. Our slender 2 percent compared to their 85 percent of world export subsidies reveals just why our exports are not performing and why our ag exports are on the losing end of the present trading situation.

In addition to export subsidies, we know that state trading enterprises like the Canadian Wheat Board use their monopoly status to engage in discriminatory and secretive pricing practices to undercut U.S. producers.

Now, to build the momentum necessary to tackle these unfair trade practices, the gentleman from Idaho (Mr. SIMPSON) and I formed the WTO Trade Caucus for Farmers and Ranchers. The 50-plus members of our group, House Members, Senators, Republicans and Democrats, developed a list for agriculture trade objectives for the upcoming round including the elimination of export subsidies, cutting and, when possible, eliminating tariffs, and imposing transparency and market discipline on State trading enterprises.

Our list of objectives was derived from concerns we have heard from the farmers we represent as well as the commodity groups themselves. This list serves three important purposes. Going into the Seattle round, it signals what the United States Congress believes it must have out of this round.

Now, our views are important because, unlike other systems where the Government may cut the deal and that is the end of it, whatever comes out of this round will be brought back to Congress for approval, and we intend to make sure that these objectives are met.

MAY FREEDOM AND LIBERTY CONTINUE TO FLOURISH THROUGHOUT CENTRAL EUROPE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. KIND) is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. KIND. Mr. Speaker, I rise tonight to commemorate the 10th anniversary this week of one of the most astounding events of the 20th century, the collapse of the Berlin Wall on November 9, 1989, and the collapse of Communism throughout central Europe.

What started as a ripple, solidarity's triumph in Poland in June of that summer, Hungary opening its border with Austria that summer, led to a deluge of East Germans streaming across the Berlin border and eventually tearing down the symbol of oppression in Europe, the Wall. A few short weeks later came the Velvet Revolution that changed Czechoslovakia.

One of my most cherished possessions that I keep on my desk here in Washington is a chunk of that Berlin Wall with some of the graffiti paint still on it, coincidentally, shaped like Wisconsin. I was able to knock out this piece with a sledgehammer while I was in Berlin on October 3, 1990, celebrating the reunification of both Germanys.

Today, the political map of Europe looks completely different. As this map depicts, Mr. Speaker, democracy has been flourishing and sweeping across Europe. The countries shaded in blue are those democratic nations that existed before 1989. The purple-shaded area are those countries that have evolved into democratic nations since the revolutions of 1989. Obviously, we still have some work to do in Belarus and down in the Balkans and Serbia, as represented by the red countries shown on the map.

Now, 10 years later, the events seem preordained. But at the time, no one could predict these events or know how to respond to them. Today, many want to claim credit. But the most important wall that fell was not even visible. It was the wall of fear inside people. It is difficult to describe the role that fear plays to maintain a totalitarian state.

Mikhail Gorbachev, however, changed the dynamics by sending out messages that his rule would not be sanctioned only by guns and tanks. His policies of Glasnost and Perestroika showed that not only would he not oppose reforms, but actually encourage them.

As a third-year law student, I watched with rapt attention, as the rest of the world did, to the unfolding of these events during 1989. It came at a critical point in my life. I was feeling a little disillusioned, a little bit cynical about our own democratic process in this Nation. So I went to central Europe a few months after the resolutions, lived out of a backpack, and traveled throughout the capitals of central Europe to see these changes first hand.

While traveling there, I met the real heroes of the revolution. People who restored my hope for the institutions of democracy. They were students about my age who were on the front lines of the demonstrations, literally staring down the barrel of guns and Soviet-made tanks, not knowing if they were going to succeed or suffer another Prague Spring like in 1968 or Budapest in 1956.

History later showed that in the case of the Velvet Revolution in Czechoslovakia, velvet to symbolize the smooth and peaceful transition of power that took place, the Communist Politburo voted just five to four against ordering a massacre.

When I spoke to those students, they remembered two distinct things about the demonstrations: how cold they were during the candle light vigils that took place all night, and how scared they were knowing the history of previous reform attempts in their own country.

They did not have weapons to fight back with, only their courage. They knew they were risking it all, but they chose to do so for the sake of their own future. And they prevailed.

It is a magnificent irony of history today that one of the most oppressive Communist regimes throughout central Europe, Czechoslovakia, would later be led by former poets and playwrights in the country, one of whom was Vaclav Havel. He was one of the key leaders of the Velvet Revolution. He was the first democratically elected leader of Czechoslovakia since Mazaryek and Eduard Benes before the Second World War. He was also one of the founders of Charter 77, the moral blueprint for change in Czechoslovakia. He helped form the Civic Forum, the political alternative to the Communist regime, but not before he was in prison four times as a political dissident.

In fact, during one of his stays in prison, he became deathly ill. The Communist authorities, afraid they were going to have a martyr on their hands, went to him and told him that the people in New York who give out the Obey awards were willing to host him so he could direct his own play on Broadway as well as receive proper medical attention and care.

He asked them one question, if he went, would he be allowed to return to Czechoslovakia. They could not give that assurance. So he said I will stay instead. The rest, as we now know it, is history.

So, Mr. Speaker, I want to pay a special tribute and wish a special anniversary to a few students who inspired me. To Andreas of Dresden, Peter of Krakow, Jitka, Ladka, Ivana, and Paulina of Prague, happy anniversary and thank you for showing with your courage that there are some causes and ideals greater than oneself worth risking everything for. May freedom and liberty continue to flourish throughout central Europe.

GOOD TIME FOR CONGRESS TO REASSESS ANTITRUST LAWS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Texas (Mr. PAUL) is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. PAUL. Mr. Speaker, by now, the Microsoft antitrust case should have caught every Member's attention. This is a good time for Congress to reassess the antitrust laws.

Under current law, collusion, negotiations, or even discussions about markets may be enough to find someone guilty of breaking these laws. Prices in one industry that are too high, too low, or all the same are suspect and could be used as evidence of monopoly practices.

We must remember bigness in a free market is only achieved by the vote of consumers, supporting a company that gives them a good product at a low price.

It is an economic truism that the only true monopoly is government protected, such as the Post Office or a public utility. There is nothing more annoying than a government bureaucrat or Federal judge gleefully condemning a productive enterprising capitalist for doing a good job. These little men filled with envy are capable of producing nothing and are motivated by their own inadequacies and desires to wield authority against men of talent.

In a free market, the consumer is king, not the businessman. The regulators hate both and relish their role of making sure the market is fair according to their biased standards.

Antitrust suits are rarely, if ever, pursued by consumers. It is always a little disgruntled competitor, a bureaucrat who needs to justify his own existence.

Judge Jackson condemned Microsoft for being a ''vigorous protector of its own self-interests.'' Now this is to be a crime in America. To care for oneself and do what corporations are supposed to do, that is, maximize profits for stockholders by making customers happy, is the great crime committed in the Microsoft case.

Blind to the fact that there is no conflict between the self-interest of a capitalist and the consumers' best interests, the trust busters go their merry way without a complaint from the Congress which could change these laws.

Only blind resentment drives the economic planners and condemns business success, good products, low prices, and consumer satisfaction while undermining the system that has provided so much for so many.

Many big companies have achieved success with government subsidies, contracts, and special interest legislation. This type of bigness must be distinguished from bigness achieved in a free market by providing consumer satisfaction.

To help rectify the situation, Congress should first stop all assistance to business, no more corporate welfare, no bailouts like we saw to Lockheed, Chrysler, Long-Term Capital Management and many others.

Second, we ought to repeal the archaic and impossible-to-understand antitrust laws.

Next, we should crown the consumers king and let them vote with their money on who should succeed and who should fail.

We should then suppress the envy which drives the anticapitalist mentality.

The Bill Gateses of the world can only invest their money in job-creating projects or donate it to help the needy. The entrepreneurial giants are not a threat to stability or prosperity. Government bureaucrats and Federal judges are. But strict enforcement of all the ill-inspired antitrust laws does not serve the consumer, nor the cause of liberty.

WE ARE NOT GOING TO RAID THE SOCIAL SECURITY TRUST FUND

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. MINGE) is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. MINGE. Mr. Speaker, this week, Congress and the administration are struggling over how we handle the so-called end game with the Federal budget. Those of us here in the House of Representatives are a critical part of this end game negotiating process in the votes that it will take to pass the budget.

One of the chief rallying cries that I hear from my colleagues is, we are not going to raid the Social Security Trust Fund. We are not going to raid the Social Security Trust Fund. We will not raid the Social Security Trust Fund. The phrase is repeated ad nauseam. But I challenge my colleagues to really accomplish what we have stated we intend to accomplish.

And the reason that I say this is that for many it is feared that we are only pandering to the misunderstandings and the naivete almost of the American public in claiming that we are not invading the Social Security Trust Fund to finance Federal expenditures.

I would like to point out that claims that we will not invade the Social Security Trust Fund come from all quarters, but today I was amazed to see a letter signed by the leadership of this body, the Speaker, the majority leader, the majority whip, and the conference chair on the other side of the aisle that included a sentence to this effect: ''We will not schedule any piece of legislation on the House floor that spends one penny of Social Security.''

I would like to contrast this with an article in the Wall Street Journal a week ago Friday that reports that the Congressional Budget Office estimates that the GOP spending bills are already over the targets by $31 billion, and that if we look at the report from the Congressional Budget Office, we will see that the GOP spends $17 billion of the Social Security surplus.

What is most troubling to me about this is the duplicity that is involved. We are breaching the faith of the American public. It is absolutely wrong that we resort to smoke and mirrors and gimmicks to claim that we are not going into the Social Security Trust Fund. It is all together too familiar. We heard all of these statements during the Reagan administration and during the Bush administration when we had enormous deficits. And now that we are on the verge of balancing the budget without using Social Security, I think we have just as much an obligation to the American people to be candid, to be forthright, and not resort to smoke and mirrors and tricks.

The Wall Street Journal article, which is up here, illustrates one of the problems that is involved, and that problem is picking and choosing what numbers are used to do the accounting. Anyone who has worked with certified public accountants understands accounting principles and a financial statement in terms of its integrity. And the integrity of that financial statement requires that generally accepted accounting principles must be consistently applied. That concept of consistent application is what has been violated by the leadership here in the House of Representatives by picking and choosing where the numbers come from, the Congressional Budget Office at one point, the Office of Management and Budget at another.

This violates a fundamental rule in accounting, not consistently applying the accounting principles; or, in this case, the budget forecasting. Picking and choosing. And we should no more let the White House do that than let Members of our own body do that. We in Congress should stand square behind the principle that we insist that the budget forecasting process have integrity, and that we not claim that no such bill has been on the floor of the House when the Wall Street Journal has already reported that we have done it and when the Congressional Budget Office has already reported that we are $17 billion into the Social Security surplus.

We must improve our practices if we are going to continue to have any credibility. We cannot have letters of the type that are circulating in this Chamber today. And, Mr. Speaker, I will submit this letter for the RECORD.

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, DC, November 8, 1999.

DEAR COLLEAGUE: Many of you are asking when we expect the budget negotiations to be completed. We expect budget negotiations to be complete when we have a balanced budget that doesn't raid Social Security, doesn't raise taxes and pays down the debt for the third year in a row.

Earlier this year our conference committed to stop the 30-year raid on Social Security—and according to the Congressional Budget Office, we have done that. The President began the budget negotiations by taking a large step our way and joining us in our commitment to lock away every penny of Social Security. We're working with him in a bipartisan fashion to protect retirement security.

The key to the whole puzzle is protecting Social Security and paying down debt. We will not schedule any piece of legislation on the House floor that spends one penny of Social Security. That said, we expect to adjourn for the year when we've ensured that every penny of Social Security is locked away.

If you have any questions, please feel free to contact us personally.

Sincerely,

J. DENNIS HASTERT,
Speaker of the House.
DICK ARMEY,
Majority Leader.
TOM DELAY,
Majority Whip.
J.C. WATTS,
Conference Chairman.

ONE PENNY ON A DOLLAR WILL SAVE SOCIAL SECURITY

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. FLETCHER). Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Georgia (Mr. KINGSTON) is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. KINGSTON. Mr. Speaker, I wanted to start off by just kind of rebutting my distinguished colleague. The Wall Street Journal is a great newspaper, but, tell me, have my colleagues ever read a newspaper that does not sometimes get it wrong; does not stretch the truth?

Here is a report from the Congressional Budget Office. Now, I know the good folks at the Wall Street Journal know everything there is about Congress and spending and so forth, but these people are actually hired to do this job, they are the ones who are in the room. CBO stands for Congressional Budget Office, and they have certified that the Republican budget does not raid the Social Security Trust Fund, as have the Democrat budgets for the past 40 years. Here is what it says: Projected on-budget surplus under the congressional scoring, the way it is done, $1 billion, and this is as of October 27, 1999.

Now, it is real odd to me that people who have been voting against every single appropriations bill because they do not spend enough money are now coming in here in the 11th hour and trying to rewrite the rules. Where was this fiscal austerity back during the September and October debates? All we heard from the liberal side of the aisle was, ''You don't spend enough money, so we are going to vote no.''

Well, hello, where does the money come from? Social Security. We have held the line on it, we have passed the appropriation bills, 13 of them on Republican votes, because we could not get our Democrat colleagues to join us because it did not spend enough money for them.

Yes, there have been a few defectors, and we appreciate them, but we started this year taking the President on. He said from the well of the House let us spend 40 percent, actually I think it was 38 percent, of the Social Security surplus on a whole line of new entitlement programs. But the Republicans' key goal is to not spend the Social Security surplus. That is a quote. That is a direct quote from the White House Chief of Staff John Podesta, and that was as of October 20.

Now, that is coming from the folks who do not exactly like Republicans down on 1600 Pennsylvania Avenue. We are not going to spend the Social Security surplus.

Now, what have we proposed doing? We have proposed reducing the size of the government budget. For every $1 we have asked the bureaucracies in Washington to cut out a penny, and they can do it. Here is an example of one place they could do it. Now, we have heard there is absolutely no waste, but this is the President's trip to Africa. He went on a number of trips this year. He went to China and spent $18.8 million, took 500 people; went to Chile, spent $10.5 million; went to Africa and spent $42.8 million, and took 1300 of his dearest and closest Federal Government friends. Now, there were other people. This does not include Secret Service or Peace Corps, this only includes Federal Government employees.

Now, under our radical budget, the President next year would say 13 of those friends will have to stay home. One example would be the mayor of Denver. The mayor of Denver goes to Africa with the President. Why? Is Colorado so important to our African policy? If so, why not let the good people of Denver pass a hat and pay his freight? Thirteen hundred people went to Africa for $42.8 million. There is not a Member of this House who would say that was a wise expenditure of money, and there is not a member of this White House who would say he could not cut some of that out.

Or what about the $3 million ducks in Hawaii? The U.S. Department of Interior bought an island off of Hawaii for $30 million. The purpose was so ducks could breed on it. The only problem was only 10 ducks took advantage of this new honeymoon package. So what we have are ducks, $3 million each, over there having a big time. Now, we need to find a Hugh Hefner kind of duck who can promote this thing a little bit and maybe we can get it down to $1 million or $2 million a duck.

I think back in South Georgia we would probably call this a waste of money, and I suspect the folks would in Kansas, New York, and all over the place.

What is this really about? This is about trying to get Washington on line with the American people, the people who drive an extra two blocks to fill up their tank for $1.07 a gallon instead of $1.15 a gallon; the people who do not buy a new suit until the clothes are on sale; the people who go out to eat when they have a coupon and order chicken instead of steak; and the people who do not buy any running shoes unless they are the discontinued brand or marked down 50 percent; and the parents who raise their kids to turn off the light when they leave a room, and do not run the water when they brush their teeth.

We are saying to Washington that they should live their lives like the American people. If we can, we can find a lot more than a penny on a dollar and we can save Social Security.

NEW SENSE OF HOPE AND RENEWAL TO EASTERN NORTH CAROLINIANS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentlewoman from North Carolina (Mrs. CLAYTON) is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mrs. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I will leave a response to that very comical presentation to a later time.

I have a more serious and also a very jovial and happy announcement to make, and that is to thank Members of Congress and to thank their staffs in particular for joining with 11 Members of Congress going to my district and participating in real work and giving a sense of hope and renewal to the people of eastern North Carolina.

I have pictures here that show us indeed some of the scenes wherein we were flooded. Now that we are not with the water, somehow it is forgotten that our citizens are still dealing with this. If my colleagues could begin to think of the area which was devastated, they might think of a State about the size of Maryland, because we are involved in some 66 counties, but 33 of them have serious flooding.

The devastation in farm life is almost unimaginable. We have $1.7 billion that has been lost in the erosion of land, the loss of wildlife, the loss of various livestock, whether it be cows or pigs or chickens. In fact, 2.5 million chickens were lost, 120,000 hogs, 900,000 turkeys were lost. The loss was just devastating.

The housing will be our greatest problem. In eastern North Carolina we had a housing problem before Hurricane Floyd, and then with the housing being devastated by the rains, we now have even a more severe problem. Forty-six homes have either been damaged or completely destroyed. Ten thousand must be destroyed because they are either in harm's way, they are in the floodplain, or they have been completely destroyed.

Many of these people are older citizens. The home ownership is high there, because many of them bought their homes years ago and they are senior citizens and their income is not as robust as the economy would suggest in other areas, so we really have an area of great devastation.

So this was reason that we wanted to bring people who would bring hope and renewal, and I just want to thank Members of Congress for encouraging their staff and thank those staff members for doing this. This was actually the Congressional Black Caucus, under the leadership of the chairman, the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. CLYBURN), who thought it was a good way of showing we wanted to be the conscience of Congress by organizing this. But this really became a congressional response. It was a bipartisan response. We had many Members from the Republican side in the House who sent their staff, if their staff wanted to go, and we had members, at least three or four, of the offices from the Senate. So it was bicameral as well.

And I just wanted to thank the Members who came. They came back with different experiences, but I can tell all my colleagues what the objective was. The objective was to allow Members of Congress and their staff to see firsthand the devastation so they could be advocates as the TVs left our scenes and we no longer saw the water, as we see here; or we no longer could see the scenes from this second one, the houses in Tarboro, which is East Tarboro, which was flooded, or the fact that Princeton, the first historical black town to be in America was completely flooded, or Trenton, North Carolina, was completed flooded; Greenville, East Carolina University, 12,000 students had to be relocated because of the flood.

Well, the objectives of this was simply to put a face onto this; that we can look at the human beings that were suffering and see their pain, their anguish, but also their hope. So it was to raise the sensitivity and the awareness and the knowledge of staff members and Members of Congress so they would be advocates so they could help us respond to this in a meaningful way.

The second objective was to bring hope itself, to bring hope and renewal to the people who are now suffering. You go through stages in this. The first people are so grateful that they have survived the flood and their adrenaline is flowing with the outpouring of generosity there. But later on despair sets in and anger and confusion and frustration, and that is where many of them are.

But on Saturday, those who came from Washington, at least for a day, brought hope and renewal. For they were actually cleaning up various homes, removing the debris, cleaning up a business or cleaning out a church or cleaning out a senior citizen facility. They went to six different counties and 13 different sites, including a farm, removing debris from a farm.

We thought we would have 10 buses. We ended up with 12 buses. More than 550 individuals came from the capital to be engaged with the people in eastern North Carolina, and I just want to thank them. I think it gives a new face for the capital. It says that people do care.

Mr. Speaker, I think we do best as Americans when we respond to others to show that we are neighbors. Yes, we are legislators, but also we are human beings in America.

EDUCATION SPENDING BILL

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. FLETCHER). Under the Speaker's announced policy of January 6, 1999, the gentleman from Colorado (Mr. SCHAFFER) is recognized for 60 minutes as the designee of the majority leader.

Mr. SCHAFFER. Mr. Speaker, I am joined tonight by a couple of colleagues and others that I know are expecting to come over to the floor to help in this discussion.

What we want to focus on this evening is our efforts to pass a series of appropriations bills that bring this country in under the budget caps that both the Congress and the White House had agreed to previously and, also, to alert our colleagues as to some of the real challenges that confront us as a Congress tonight and over the weekend and over the next couple of days that we are here in Washington as we move toward this deadline of Wednesday that we have set for ourselves, an expectation and anticipation that we will be able to arrive at a compromise with the White House.

Because it is very clear, Mr. Speaker, that compromising with the White House is an expensive proposition.

The Congressional Budget Office, as had been pointed out by colleague the gentleman from Georgia (Mr. KINGSTON) who spoke just a few moments ago, had certified that the proposal that Republicans had put forward does balance the budget without raiding the Social Security trust fund and dip into Social Security funds to pay for Government, as has been the tradition over a great many years. And we are have very proud of that, and we want to stick as closely as possible to that ultimate goal.

But things are getting a little more challenging in these negotiations with the White House. And I want to talk specifically about the budget as it relates to the topic of education.

The United States Department of Education is an agency that controls approximately $120 billion in assets and expenditures, about $35 billion in annual expenditures, at least according to the dollar amounts that we have set for the Department of Education; and the balance being the loan portfolio that the Department of Education maintains.

Well, the President believes that we need to spend more. We have in fact, as I mentioned, budgeted $35 billion for the Department in the current spending bill, including $1.2 billion for the process of teaching to help appeal to the professional senses of our educators and classroom professionals throughout the country, to provide for more training for more teachers for those districts that wish to hire them and to do so within a framework of flexibility, not constraints but flexibility, in exchange for accountability.

We believe there is a legitimate role for the Federal Government to be concerned about local schools but not to run them. We want to send the dollars back to local school districts, back to classrooms, and appeal to the professional sensibilities and the care and compassion and concern of qualified superintendents, school principals, locally elected school board members, and so on.

Therein lies the difference, Mr. Speaker, that I want to zero in on tonight. Because the President's plan and the reason he vetoed the education spending bill, the reason he is holding that particular bill up at this very moment is a matter of philosophy. You see, we really do believe on the Republican side in our philosophy and our values of getting dollars back to the States with freedom and flexibility.

But the President, instead, would like to hire approximately 100,000 Government agents, Federal agents, and have those Federal employees working in classrooms and in my school where my children are educated. We believe, the Republican side, we want to give those dollars to classrooms and give them to local leaders and so on, but we do not want to define specifically how those dollars must be spent. We do not want to confine principals. We do not want to constrain superintendents. We do not want to limit the options and the freedom and liberty that local elected educators have. And we also want to honor and respect the leadership of governors throughout the country.

There was a reporter just today who asked the President the following question, and I will quote the question. He says, ''Mr. President, on the issue of funding for teachers, sir, you resent it when Congress tells you to spend money in ways which you do not deem appropriate.''

Let me stop right there at the reporter's question as it was put to the President. The President does disagree with this. We want to get dollars to the classrooms, to the local schools, and allow local professionals to determine how best to utilize those funds in the best interest of children. As the reporter accurately points out, the President resents it when Congress tells ''you'', the President, to spend money in ways which do you not deem appropriate.

The reporter goes on: ''Why should a state governor who would like to spend that money differently feel any differently?'' And of course, the President has a different answer when it comes to governors. Here is what the President said in responding to governors and to this question. He said, ''Well, because it's not their money.''

Now, this is the problem with Washington. In fact, that is what is sick with this city in Washington, D.C., when it comes to taking cash from the American people, bringing it here to Washington, sending those dollars back to the States, and putting crippling rules and regulations on those dollars and placing conditions on those dollars, which is what governors resent and what governors feel differently about.

The President's answer is one that so many people in this bureaucratic mentality of Washington represent. He says, ''Well, because it's not their money.''

The point being, this money must be his money. This money must be Government's money. This money must have been created somehow by people here in Washington.

Well, I think most Americans, when they realize the attitude that comes from the other end of Pennsylvania Avenue, it does not represent them, that this attitude is what people are most disgusted about when they think about Washington, D.C.

We are trying to change that in this budget. That is the element of the debate that currently is holding up the agreement from going forward in this negotiation between the White House and the Congress.

Well, we passed legislation, as I mentioned earlier, that deals with this effort to try to get dollars to local school districts and do it in a much more powerful and effective way and a way that more closely approximates the local priorities of school districts. And we are very serious about following through on that.

We believe the liberty to teach and the freedom to learn are goals and objectives to which not only this Congress should aspire but the American people in general wish us to pursue, and we are going to stay on that course.

The argument is compounded even further in our position, and the strength of it I think becomes even more apparent when you consider today's headline in the New York Daily News. I know this is small, but it is a copy of the front page. ''Not Fit to Teach Your Kid. In some city schools, 50 percent of teachers are uncertified,'' says the headline in the New York Daily News.

And the article that follows this headline shows that when you throw dollars at a goal of just simply hiring more Government employees that frequently you do not get the quality of teachers in this case that the American people would expect and that children in fact need.

That is, I am afraid, the ultimate goal of the President's approach of restricting the dollars as they go to States, restricting them by tying strings to them, attaching mandates to those dollars. It will result I submit, Mr. Speaker, in more headlines like this not just in New York City but throughout the country. It is the kind of headline that we are working very hard to avoid, in fact, and have headlines that we can be quite proud of about the professional kinds of teachers that we have in mind for hiring around the country through the leadership and through the initiative of governors, State legislators, school board members, principals, and superintendents.

Mr. Speaker, I yield the floor to the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. PETERSON) who has worked very hard on this very topic and knows quite well how important it is to fight to get dollars to the classroom.

Mr. PETERSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Colorado (Mr. SCHAFFER) for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, it is interesting, because most budget battles are about dollars, but the education debate going on in Washington now is not about more money. There is no argument about how much money we should spend but where the control lies.

I think this is a pretty significant discussion that the American people needs to take seriously. And the question I ask, should the Federal Government dictate priorities for our local school districts? I think the vast majority of Americans would vote no to that. The vast majority of Americans would not want the Federal Government dictating local educational policies.

Now, it is interesting, last year in some debate I remember the numbers, I think we take credit for supplying between 6.8 to 7 percent of the local dollars for basic education. But many said we provide 70 percent of their bureaucratic nightmares. In other words, to get your hands on the Federal money, you have to have a lot of expertise. And it is interesting, when you look at the numbers of school districts who get very little Federal money and those who get a lot, that is the answer.

So small, rural school districts, which I represent, I have school districts who get less than one-half of one percent of their money from the Federal Government. So no matter what we do here, it will not have a huge impact. And why do they not get that money?

Well, in rural school districts you have a school superintendent and he is the butcher, the baker, and the candlestick maker. He does not have a finance officer. He does not have a curriculum director. He or she plays numerous roles because they do not have the dollars to have this bureaucracy within the school districts that can go after Federal dollars.

Most school districts that are successful have specialized grantsmen who do nothing but look through the records and find out what programs may apply and how to apply for them. Urban suburban areas also have the luxury of educational consultants they can hire to help them get the Federal money.

Now, when you have a bureaucratic system like that, it is rich get rich and the poorer get poorer because the poor do not have the money to invest in getting the Federal money. That is why in Pennsylvania, where I come from, there are schools who get less than one-half of one percent of their money from the Federal Government and there are schools that get 12 and 13 percent of their money from the Federal Government. Now, that is 25 times as much. Is that fair? No, that is not fair. But that is Federal bureaucracy, this federalized system.

It is interesting because now the President is really hanging out out there and I heard his top people over the weekend talking about they were hanging out for a 100,000 teachers. In other words, if you will hire teachers, you can get in line for this money. But if you need computers, if you need more classrooms, if you need technology of some kind, if you need your school wired, if you need new books, we are not going to help you.

Now, I think that that is the mistake. And I want to relate it back to several years ago the President wanted 100,000 cops, and the record on that program in place a number of years now has never put 100,000 cops on the streets of America.

In fact, I recently had my staff working with two communities who are on hard times who got seduced by that program to hire more cops because they were free and they could use the police protection. But now they are finding out that is a temporary program and that is this teaching program, if I understand it right, it is a temporary program. So they are going to hire more teachers and in a couple years there will be no Federal money to pay for them, they will have to have the local resources.

Now, should we be seducing schools and communities to hire more teachers and more cops if we are not going to be there year after year? Is that how we build a good educational system? I do not think so. Because just a few years ago, we had more computers and more technology, more emphasis on science and math. And basic literacy has been an issue year after year, and we have several dozen literacy programs.

Is it cost effective to have several dozen literacy programs that schools can apply for, or to have one literacy program? Now we have several dozen. We have had programs to promote parental involvement. We have had programs suggested that we should build schools from the Federal level. And, of course, the issue of accountability never really gets addressed very much. And I think that is the question parents ask, is how do we keep our educational system accountable?

It is interesting as we have this debate and the unfairness of it, when we have 6.8 percent of the money is what we claim funds local education. I recently asked the Department of Education in Pennsylvania, I would like a printout of the money that each and every school district in Pennsylvania, and there are 530 some, gets to fund their schools, local money, State money and Federal money. They have that, and they gave me this printout. The part that surprised me was when they added up the column for Federal aid, it came to 3.1 percent. We said, there must be something wrong. So we sent it back to them. We said, you must have missed some Federal program, some major one. They came back to us and they said, no, we think all Federal money is included.

So the question I ask is, if 6.8 percent is what we are supposed to be providing, and if only 3.1 percent in this State, Pennsylvania, is getting into the classroom, where did the rest of the money go? I do know one thing, that when I served in State government, the bureaucracy there was pretty well funded with Federal dollars. We have a bureaucracy here in town funded with Federal dollars. We have regional bureaucracies that are funded with Federal dollars. It is my opinion, and I am not saying 3.1 percent is totally accurate because I expected to have a couple of percent chewed up in bureaucracy. I did not expect over half.

But as we continue to review this, I think it helps make the argument we make. Let us fund dollars that get to the classroom. Let us not say to schools, if you want our money, you have got to buy computers or you have got to hire teachers or you have to build more schools or you have to do certain things, because those things vary from State to State and community to community. We have 530 school districts in Pennsylvania. Multiply that by 50 States. There is a huge difference in what goes on in Alaska and what goes on in Florida and what goes on in Maine and what goes on in Missouri or Arizona, or Pennsylvania, or California. There are very different parts of this country.

I think saying 100,000 teachers is about politics. That is a slogan. That is a campaign issue. That is not about helping education. Because if we really wanted to help education, we would cut through this bureaucratic maze and we would get dollars into the classroom that would be allowed to fix up the classroom, that would be allowed to hire more teachers if that is the goal, would be allowed to buy more computers and more technology, buy more books, do things that enhance the educational process, recruit the right kind of teachers for science and math which are in short supply, but allow the local districts to make those decisions of how they can best use those dollars.

I say, Mr. President, when I have school districts that get less than 1 percent of their funding from the Federal Government, I am sure they are not going to be standing up clapping when you talk about 100,000 new teachers, because there is no way they can reach that.

I just want to share, I was disappointed in the President's comments today. He said, ''Well, because it's not their money,'' and he is not the first politician that has said that. Lots of politicians have said that. It is like it is their money. But he went on to say, ''If they don't want the money, they don't have to take it. If they are offended by it, they can give it to the other States and other school districts.'' I am disappointed in that kind of rhetoric at this point in the process. I am disappointed in that kind of an attitude, because I think it is time that we think about the kids, we think about maximizing their potential education, and stop arguing about political slogans that will be used in brochures another 12 months and get down to saying, let us get the money to the schools. If we are only getting 60 percent of it there, let us say we try to get 70 this year. If we are only getting 50 percent there, let us say we try to get 65 and next year 85 and let us get the money driven out. Let us somehow work through this bureaucratic maze that is chewing up these bucks and have the money go out there in someway that poor districts, that rural districts who do not have grantsmen, who do not have a lot of staff can get their fair share of Federal resources.

The Federal program, in my view, rewards the rich, those who have the staff, those who have their own bureaucracy and can meet the needs of a Federal bureaucracy and leaves the poor, impoverished school districts out to lunch.

Mr. SCHAFFER. Your comments about the differences between rural districts, urban districts, wealthy districts and poor districts is right at the heart of this debate over Clinton teachers versus local school teachers. It comes down to this. There are many, many places in America where districts need more teachers. They need the resources to hire more teachers, get them into classrooms, reduce class size, where these are the locally established goals, goals established by locally elected school board members, by principals who know the names of the students in those classrooms, by superintendents who know the names of the principals and so on. For those school districts, we say you ought to be able to spend your money on classroom reduction, to hire new teachers, local teachers if you would like.

The President's answer is one that you have summed up perfectly, referring to his comments earlier today, that we should do it Clinton's way, because, as he says, well, because it is not their money. It is not that local principal's money, it is not that Governor in Pennsylvania's money or Colorado's money. This money somehow, according to people in the White House, belongs to, well, the White House, and they therefore believe that they have some title to define how those dollars should be spent. The principals who want to hire more teachers, they ought to be able to use their funds, their Federal funds, to hire more teachers, but those that wish to invest in technology, to buy a new school bus, to resurface the roof, to do a number of other things that they might believe to be more important, to target those dollars to reading programs for disadvantaged children and things of that sort, those teachers ought to have the full freedom, the full liberty to use their money as they see fit. That is the difference. We view these precious dollars that taxpayers send to Washington and we then send back to the States as the taxpayers' money. Down at the White House, they view these dollars as the White House's money. When the President uses that kind of language and that kind of attitude, I want our colleagues and the American people to know that the President is in for a fight on this one. These dollars do not belong to people in Washington. Americans work too hard to earn these dollars and send them here. I think they send too much here. But acknowledging that they work hard to send those dollars here to Washington, I want people to know that there is a party here in Washington that is going to stand up and look after those dollars and is going to send them back home with the fewest amount of strings and regulations and red tape and mandates attached, and that this is a fight worth fighting and we are going to stand in there for those children who ultimately will benefit from greater academic liberty and freedom and more managerial freedom at local levels.

It also raises another point, and, that is, did we not already provide these 100,000 Clinton teachers? Did we not already fund them? Because that was in last year's budget as well. What happened to those? As it turns out, the President estimated that he had only hired 21,000 teachers with the dollars we appropriated and as it turns out, an even deeper analysis concludes that we probably did not even hire those teachers with the funds that the White House insisted on last year. And so when you send these kinds of dollars to specific school districts and tell them that you have just got to go out and hire people, what happens is exactly what happens in New York, if you read the New York Daily News today, that in New York they took the cash. Of course, there is no principal or superintendent or school board that is going to turn down the cash. They took the cash and they hired teachers who are not certified, because they just had to spend the money, just spend cash. It did not matter whether the children were benefitting. It did not matter whether the kids were getting smarter. It did not matter whether they were hiring teachers that were capable of teaching. They just hired people, uncertified teachers in this case, as many as 50 percent in some New York schools. This is a bad formula for education in America and it is not the formula we want to see.

I know there are a great number of us here in Congress who focus on this topic and feel passionately about it. Another one is with us today, the gentleman from California (Mr. MCKEON), a member of the Committee on Education and the Workforce and subcommittee chairman, one who has demonstrated day after day and time after time his commitment to getting dollars to the classroom and looking out for children rather than the education special interests that we find here in Washington, D.C.

I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. MCKEON. Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the gentleman from Colorado (Mr. SCHAFFER) for taking the time to set up this special order to give us a chance to talk a little bit about what we are trying to do in education on our side of the aisle.

Last year, early this year, we in our subcommittee started holding hearings on what we could do to improve and to help education. We were specifically looking at what we could do to help improve teaching. We started holding hearings around the country and here in Washington and people came and testified before us, people from various phases of education, administrators, teachers, school board members, parents, and they all said one thing in common, that the most important person in teaching is the parent; number two, the next most important person is the teacher. I think we all agreed on that and in a bipartisan way we moved forward and crafted legislation that said we would send money to the local school districts and let them decide how they would spend that money. We gave the highest priority to classroom reduction, class size reduction, because we felt that was a very high priority. However, if the district was unable to hire qualified teachers, we said that they could use that money to train the teachers that they now had.

We had a young man, a young educator, African-American from Washington, D.C. come in to testify. He had been teaching, he said, for a couple of years, and he felt very inadequate. He was put in a third-grade class and was told to teach these children how to read. He knew how to read and the principal said, you know how to read, teach them how to read. But he had never in his education had a class on how to teach reading, and he was very frustrated. He felt like he was not doing an adequate job and he was ready to leave the profession. Fortunately, somebody was able to get him to a class where he was able to learn how to teach and he was doing a much better job, his students were prospering, he was feeling better about himself and stayed in the profession.

I have some real concerns about hiring a lot of people that may not be adequately prepared. In my own State of California, we reduced class size a couple of years ago, we put that as the number one priority from the governor, they mandated from the State headquarters class size reduction, and it has resulted in over 30,000 underqualified teachers in California.

Another example, Jacques Steinberg of the New York Times wrote that 58 percent of newly hired teachers in the Los Angeles Unified School District, which is part of my district, are not certified. Instead, some were hired solely on their experience of leading church or camping groups. I am not saying that these are not good people and I am not saying that they are not concerned and they are trying to do their best, I am just saying that they are not prepared. We said in our bill that you take the money and you decide what is best for your local school district. The gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. PETERSON), the gentleman from Colorado (Mr. SCHAFFER), myself from southern California, all have different kinds of districts.

I served for 9 years on a local school board. I was very frustrated with the mandates coming from Washington, or the mandates coming from Sacramento. That was one of the reasons why I ran for Congress and why I am happy to be on the Committee on Education and the Workforce and why I wanted to, to see if we could not try to solve a problem. Many Democrats joined with us in this legislation on teacher empowerment. They felt like it was the right thing to do. We talked and said, once in a while you can do the right thing here. But it is like the President is stuck on this 100,000 teachers and no matter what we do or say, he says, we are not leaving town until we give him a program for 100,000 teachers. We say, we have the program. The only thing we are saying is, we are not going to run it out of Washington, we are going to let the local people decide. The money is there. Take the money. If you need it to hire teachers, do it. If you need it to train teachers, do it. If you need it to provide merit pay to ensure that your teachers do a better job or the better teachers are rewarded, do it. If you need it for tenure reform or other innovations, do it. But you have the responsibility. You have the ability.

I represented our area in the State school board association for the time when I was on the school board. We had 6,000 locally elected school board members in California. They were good people. They were sincere. They really wanted to do what was right for the children. But their hands in most cases are tied, because of mandates that come out of Washington. If we send this money out and say, you can use it because the President says so for a Federal mandate to reduce class size, K–3, to 18 children, I do not know where they got that magical number, but that is what they said and that is the only choice you have, and like the gentleman from Pennsylvania said, his district probably will not see any of that money. Your districts may not see some of that money. But what we are saying is use it to improve the teachers that you now have. Help them do a better job.

We did a press conference today and outside we were talking to a reporter.

□ 2015

And there was one of our security people standing right there, a mother; and I could see, she heard us talking and I could just see she wanted to enter into this conversation. And the reporter was asking questions, well, do you feel like you have reneged because you agreed to the President's 100,000 teachers last year and now you are backing out from it? I said look, we are not backing off of that at all. We are just saying that instead of Washington having to decide, we let the local people decide. Ask this lady right here. She looks like a mother. Ask her if she wants to have the best qualified teacher or if she wants the smaller class size.

We say, she can have both. I have six children that grew up through the public education system. I have 17 grandchildren now growing up through the public education system. I have talked to my daughters, and I have talked to my daughters-in-law; and I find out what is going on in the school and they say look, if we have a chance to get the best teacher in the second grade class, and all teachers are not equal, if we have a chance to get that teacher and the class size is 25, worse is the teacher that they just hired to fill a Washington mandate and maybe made the class size 18, if I had my choice, I will take the teacher, the good, qualified teacher in the 25-student classroom, because I know my student will get a better education than they will in a smaller class size with a poorly prepared or inadequately prepared teacher.

All we are saying, we are not fighting over the money, we are not fighting with the President. We are saying, Mr. President, join us. Call this your bill. Make it the Clinton Teacher Empowerment Act. I do not care. But let us put the students first, let us put our children first, and let us let their parents at the local level, the school boards at the local level be involved in the decision. Let them decide. Because one-size-fits-all out of Washington will not work.

We are going to hold on this. We think this is important. If we have to stay here, Mr. President, until Christmas, if you have to miss your trip around the world to stay here to work with us on it, let us do it; but let us remember the children first. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. SCHAFFER. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman points out really a lack of a distinction, I suppose, between the White House and the Congress when it comes to the actual dollars, because the reality is, there is no difference of opinion on the dollar amount for education and for the education budget.

We are prepared to spend $35 billion on the Department of Education, and that is what we budgeted. In fact, when we really look at the bottom line, the Republican Congress has proposed more money and has spent more money on education this year than the President himself had requested and had suggested in the education budget. So this is not about spending money. That argument has been taken away from the White House.

This is about how the money is spent, whether it goes to States with the flexibility and freedom to hire more teachers if they want, to buy more computers if they want, to do more training if they want, to focus more on teacher quality if they would like, versus the President's answer which assumes that it is not their money, as the President said; the American people, it is not their money and the States, and make that assumption and send those dollars back to States with constraining, restrictive rules that say, you may only spend those education dollars in a narrow sort of way.

I represent a lot of rural districts in my congressional district. Even if we assume there are 100,000 teachers in this package, which there are not, as we saw last year, it is not even 21,000 that the President had thought he counted in the current year; it is much less than that. When we spread 21,000 teachers across the country, let us be generous. Let us say we really do hire 100,000 new Clinton teachers. Let us say we hire those teachers out of Washington and spread them out across the country. When we get to the small districts of America, they do not get any. There are no teachers left by the time we get to these rural areas. They are all consumed by the large inner city metropolitan areas around the country, and most children in most school districts will be abandoned by this narrow, mandated, restricted process that the President has outlined to spend these dollars.

Mr. MCKEON. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, I heard a story over the weekend. One of our good Senators from the other body was having a discussion with one of the Federal bureaucrats and the Federal bureaucrat said, I resent what you are saying; I resent what you are proposing. I want you to know that I love your children every bit as much as you do. The Senator said, oh, yeah? What are their names?

I go visit a lot of schools and I see principals go into classrooms and they know their names; they know the children. Are we to say that they are not going to do what is best for the children, at least as good as what they would do out of the White House. I propose that they would do much better. Let us give them the opportunity. Let us send the money back to them, and let them hire and train and help their teachers, and let us remember the children.

Mr. KINGSTON. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, there is a great story about a teacher, and we all had these institutional teachers that everybody loved and feared, but respected and learned a lot from. This 30-year veteran of the school system in Gray, Georgia, a tiny little town outside of Macon, she was teaching, and this new up-start from the Department of Education, probably on the 6th floor up there, third office down to the right, a very important person with cell phones and laptop computers, decided she was going to go down to Gray, Georgia, and grace the good teacher with some of her wisdom.

Now, this young lady, who is a fine person, I am sure, but she had never taught kids. So she goes down to the teacher and says, you know, after 30 years of teaching, you have been teaching kids on the right-hand side of the chalkboard, and do you know that the left side of the brain learns faster than the right side, and so what you need to do is switch and put everything over on the right side of the chalkboard, or the left side of the chalkboard, because that is really where you can improve your education, teaching. This is a lady who has been teaching for 30 years, listening to a 25-year-old bureaucrat from Washington, D.C. who had never put one hour in a classroom. This was a lady, a veteran teacher that you and I talk about and our cousins talk about and our friends talk about and we still remember what she taught us about Hemingway and Thoreau and Chaucer. But the good old Department of Education, because they love children.

It is odd to me how a bureaucrat in Washington, D.C., as smart as they are, and as much love as they have in their hearts can love kids down in Gray, Georgia, and teach them better than the people in Gray, but also better than the people in New York City or California or Colorado. I mean, these are very interesting, brilliant people.

The gentleman was talking about waste. There was an interview this weekend on a television show with John Stossel and Barbara Walters, and what the Clinton person was saying, well, the Republicans want to slash class size. And Mr. Stossel, who is a neutral journalist says, oh, come on. Local districts pay for education. Is there no fat in the Education Department? In five years, Federal education funding has increased 20 percent. There are now 4,000 workers in Washington, D.C., attending conferences, making phone calls, and not teaching. Are they really necessary?

Or how about the $400,000 appropriated to build a Doctor Seuss statue. Is that really necessary? He goes on and on and on. It is not just the Department of Education. The Department of Interior, the Department of Defense, the Department of Family Services. Everything has waste in it, and the only thing we have asked these bureaucracies in Washington to do is cut out one penny on the dollar so that we will not have to spend Social Security money. We want to be able to spend it.

Mr. SCHAFFER. Mr. Speaker, reclaiming my time, the examples the gentleman used are examples that seem quite obvious to the American people, but the expenditure is coming out of the White House.

I want to go back to this example of the requirement that States use their education dollars the way the White House wants to prove the point, because the assumption is that 100,000 teachers is automatically a good idea. That sounds good to most people, 100,000 teachers. That sounds like a very positive thing. Most people who are familiar with classrooms that are overcrowded and so on just naturally assume that that is somehow going to help. But it ignores the question of quality, which is the bigger issue and the more important issue.

What we find time and time again is that a quality teacher makes far more difference than a greater volume of teachers. The research is, across the academic spectrum, replete with results showing, and this is one from the National Center for Policy Analysis, and I will just read the first paragraph: ''There is little evidence that smaller classes help students,'' says education expert Chester Finn, Jr., who by the way, was a pretty high-ranking official in the Department of Education a few years back, ''and reducing class size may even hurt student achievement if the new teachers are mediocre,'' again, bringing the argument back to the notion that quality matters more than quantity. ''Yet, President Clinton has proposed shrinking classes in the early grades to 18 students per teacher by hiring 100,000 more teachers at Federal expense for 7 years,'' and the report goes on further.

In fact, I would ask unanimous consent that this be entered into the record. It is a brilliant report that shows that just spending money does not necessarily accomplish the goal of improving teacher quality. Sometimes that can happen. Spending money sometimes can work, but what we need are locally-elected school boards; we need professionals in administrative positions, superintendents and principals and other supervisors who are capable and competent of using the dollars in a way that more effectively meets the needs and objectives of classrooms and children and fits consistently within their management style at a classroom level.

So, Mr. Speaker, I would ask unanimous consent to enter that into the RECORD at this point.

Mr. KINGSTON. Mr. Speaker, let me tell the gentleman another story from back in the district, Camden County, Georgia, a Southeast Georgia county that borders the St. Mary's River just North of Jacksonville, Florida. A lady down there, she was not a teacher, she was with the local Board of Education and she had just returned from Athens, Georgia, where the University of Georgia is located, from an anti-hugging seminar. Now, that was not the name of it, but that is what they called it.

What she had to attend was a conference put on by the national Department of Education in Athens, Georgia, for all of the teachers in the 165 school districts of the State of Georgia on not being alone with children. They told her, they said do not ever touch a child. Okay, a lot of sexual harassment going on, we can understand the good intentions here. They said, do not be alone with the child and do not ever express any kind of affection. So now she has to go back and tell all the teachers in Camden county not to hug, not to touch, not to be alone with children.

Just think about this a minute. If you are a C student and you did not get the quadratic formula the first time around, you cannot go after school and see Ms. Jones because she has to have a witness for that 20 minutes that you are with her that she did not try anything on you. And if you are a little, say, a 6-year-old or 7-year-old and you have some problems with the mechanics of relieving yourself in the boys' or girls' room, sometimes you might need a teacher assistant. You cannot do that any more without a witness, because the National Department of Education knows best for the children in Camden County.

She said, but you know what the real tragedy is? Camden County is the home of Kings Bay Naval Base, lots of young moms and dads, lots of parents of very small children who are away for 6 months at a time. She said, these little kids have a lot going on in their lives. They need a hug a lot more than they need an A, and if we want to help children, we need to get the bureaucracy in Washington off the backs of the teachers in Camden County so that they can do what they know best locally. And they are going to use good judgment.

They do not need the bureaucracy of Washington, D.C. to stick their nose in their business. I know they are doing it in, Colorado; but it is just that same Washington-knows-best culture, let us spend money because the money well, as the President said, ''it is not their money.'' I guess the President is a very wealthy guy. But it certainly, as he says, it is not their money. I would agree with him, it is certainly not the Government's money on any level; it is the taxpayers' and the hard-earned workers' money that we are spending here, and that is why we should be very careful on how we spend it.

Mr. SCHAFFER. Absolutely. The assumption that the dollars that the taxpayers send to Washington do not belong to the taxpayers, but to the people in Washington, I cannot think of a more arrogant statement for anyone in Washington to make than that which was made just today down at the White House.

Sending those dollars to Washington also entails being accountable for those dollars once they are spent. What three of us discovered, Members of Congress who actually went down to the Department of Education office building a week ago Friday, was that the Department's budget is not auditable. Their accounting system is so bad that the General Accounting Office and the Inspector General of the Department of Education have concluded that for fiscal year 1998, their books are still unauditable, meaning that we will never really know in full detail where the money went that was spent in the Department of Education in 1998.

Mr. KINGSTON. Exactly how much money is the gentleman talking about that is unauditable?

Mr. SCHAFFER. Let me use 1999, since I am more familiar with those dollars. We spend approximately $35 billion in annual appropriations for the Department of Education. The Department of Education also manages the loan portfolios of virtually every student who has gone to school in America and financed a college education through a guaranteed government student loan.

So when we add the loan portfolio, this is an agency that is in charge of a total financial portfolio of about $120 billion annually, and for an agency of that size, it makes it effectively one of the largest financial institutions on the entire planet. Their 1998 books are not auditable. The American people and this Congress have no assurance that the money in 1998 was spent well, let alone in subsequent years after that, which the appropriations are built upon.

The point of all this is, for any president or any Cabinet Secretary to suggest that there is no savings to be found in a department is ludicrous at a time when they cannot even tell us where the dollars that are already in the Department are right now. The books in the Department are not auditable.

Mr. KINGSTON. If the gentleman will yield further, Mr. Speaker, can the gentleman tell me this: If the IRS came to a business and found that business could not be audited, and they were having a dispute over accounting for tax dollars, what would the IRS do?

Mr. SCHAFFER. Depending upon the length of time, there may be some extensions that a business could file, but not without substantial penalty, and certainly corporate embarrassment. It is more a matter of an unacceptability by stockholders and people who own a business who would not put up with the management of their enterprise in such a way.

Beyond that, failure to audit books in a way which can provide a clear picture as to the tax liability will send people to jail. So in many cases, I think what the gentleman from Georgia was getting at, in many cases a business that had a picture like this of their financial statements not being auditable would be liable for substantial civil penalties, possibly criminal penalties, and certainly be looking at the potential of jail time.

I point all that out, and our goal is not to send anybody in the Department of Education to jail or even to fine them, but the point of all of this is that my constituents and the gentleman's and the constituents of every other Member of Congress worked hard today to pay their income taxes and send them here to Washington, D.C. They would prefer to see those dollars spent on things that they can have some confidence in at the local level, maybe for their families, maybe savings for their own children.

But to have those dollars taken from them, sent here to Washington, D.C. and accounted for in such a poor way, is a true disservice to the American taxpayer. The bottom line is, the inability to effectively manage the financial cash flow of a large department like the Department of Education hurts children.

This picture right here to my right represents, and I know it talks about the inability to audit the financial books of the Department of Education, but what is really jeopardized through this process is the ability to get dollars to children, to get dollars to the classroom. Children are hurt when the Department of Education is run so poorly, as we are discovering this year.

Mr. KINGSTON. Children are denied the good quality education, the quality education that they need.

It is interesting that Mobil Oil Company cut their budget by 11 percent this year. AT&T cut their budget by $2 billion. Yet, when we go to bureaucracies in Washington and ask them to come up with 1 percent, they cannot find it.

To me, if I was the President and my cabinet said that, I would say, look, you know what, this is not our money; of course, I know he thinks it is; but, you have got to find 1 percent. That is reasonable. Nobody in America cannot find one cent in a dollar they spend to come up with savings.

Mr. SCHAFFER. I want to point out again, Mr. Speaker, this is a simple picture that represents a big problem. Talking about finances and accounting and talking about financial procedures, accounting procedures, and the portfolios of loan funds and grant-backed funds is complicated, monotonous, boring stuff for a lot of people. We cannot sum up the nature of the problem by using some catchy word like 100,000 teachers, like the President would suggest that we ought to do.

What the President ought to be doing is focusing on this problem right here, the financial mismanagement of a $120 billion agency that affects children every day in America. He ought to roll up his sleeves and go down there to the Department of Education headquarters, just like Members of Congress were willing to do just a few days ago, and start asking some hard questions to the people in charge of these various programs.

I will tell the Members what he will find, which is just what we found. We did not find any real resentment or resistance, for that matter. We found some pretty conscientious employees who realized they are in deep trouble and they have a little bit of a mess over there. They have committed to working with us as Members of Congress to try to fix these problems. Again, this is the monotonous, boring, nuts and bolts details of keeping track of the people's tax dollars.

When we allow ourselves to believe, as the President clearly demonstrated he does, that it is not their money, it is not the taxpayers' money, then it becomes easier to rationalize a lot of waste in Washington. It becomes easier to rationalize rules and regulations and mandates and red tape attached to the taxpayers' dollars that renders those dollars less effective.

If we really believe that the money belongs to the White House and not to the American people, then it is easy to start talking about the taxpayers' hard-earned dollars in terms of campaign one-line gimmicks, rather than doing the hard work of helping children.

That is why there is such a difference of opinion in this appropriations process between the Congress and the White House, between the Republicans and the Democrats. On our side of the aisle, we are willing to do the hard work to help children, to squeeze the efficiency out of the Federal government so that the taxpayers are honored by having dollars come to Washington and help their children learn, not squander the dollars in Washington as though they belonged to the White House and people here in D.C., and that somehow children do not matter.

That is the difference between the Republican vision to help children and the Democrat vision to help government.

Mr. KINGSTON. If the gentleman will yield, again, all we are asking Washington to do is to do what people back home do, come up with 1 cent on every dollar they spend. One cent in savings here means savings for retirement, for social security, not just for seniors today but for all generations. That is all it takes.

I am on the Subcommittee on Agriculture, Rural Development, Food and Drug Administration, and Related Agencies of the Committee on Appropriations, and if I eat a cheese pizza, it has been inspected by the Food and Drug Administration. But if I get a pepperoni pizza, it has to be inspected by the United States Department of Agriculture.

I eat lots of pizza because I have four kids. It would appear to me that surely we could have the same inspector checking the pepperoni and the cheese pizza. I do not know if there is a different department for sardines, and knowing Washington there probably is, but it just goes on and on and on here, the potential savings that are resisted, and only in this town.

In real America, every American does what we did yesterday. Sunday morning, Sunday mid-morning you go through Parade Magazine, you go through the local coupons in your local Piggly-Wiggly, and I guess, what does the gentleman have in Colorado, Target?

Mr. SCHAFFER. We have those, yes.

Mr. KINGSTON. Target sells groceries, right? What is the gentleman's big grocery stores?

Mr. SCHAFFER. We go to Albertson's.

Mr. KINGSTON. My mother lives in Louisville, and I just wanted to make sure. I knew it was Albertson's. We have Piggly-Wiggly. If we want to buy the Special K cereal or we want to buy the Clusters, the kind of $3.50 a box stuff, we have to have the 75 cents, the 25 cents off coupons. Otherwise, we are going to get Piggly-Wiggly brand. Some of the Piggly-Wiggly brand is good but some just cannot quite compete with good old Kellogg's Corn Flakes, the best to you each morning. But we are not going to eat that unless we can save a quarter or 50 cents.

We are not unusual. We are out there raising kids. That is just what we do. If we get our car washed, it is because we bought 8 gallons worth of gas. When we fill up our tank, it is when we have found the cheapest gas station on the block, the one that is $1.07 a gallon, not the one that is $1.15. I do not know who buys that premium unleaded stuff that is $1.27 a gallon. Somebody must, but it is not people I know. People I know do not buy suits unless they are on sale. They do not buy running shoes unless they are discontinued. They do not buy steak, they eat chicken. This is what American families go through every single day.

If you want to go on a vacation, you save up your money and the dryer breaks, or you have to buy such exciting items as a new set of tires for your stationwagon. That is what America goes through daily, not just every now and then but every single day.

What we are asking Washington to do just one time, for the sake of social security and for the sake of not having a tax increase, just find one measly little penny on every dollar they save so that we can protect and preserve social security, not for the next election but for the next generation.

Mr. SCHAFFER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to use an example. That is, what Americans really want is to be able to send their tax dollars to a legitimate purpose, to help schoolchildren, in this example. There is a difference between sending those dollars directly to our local school or through the State, which the Constitution clearly places States as the legitimate jurisdiction to set up a public school system and to manage local schools. Most States defer a tremendous amount of authority to local school boards.

Some of those dollars come here to Washington, D.C. So for a taxpayer who sends his or her hard-earned education tax dollar to Washington, I want to show the Members where those education tax dollars go. Because first, there is an expense associated with just paying the taxes, with complying with the IRS, and the Federal government spends a certain amount of our education dollar right up front just to pay for the cost of collecting that education dollar. That comes right out of the education apple to begin with.

Then those dollars come here to Congress, and we redistribute those dollars. By the time they leave the United States Department of Education and come through this process, the U.S. Department of Education takes its bite out of the apple, and it is a pretty substantial bite out of the apple, as well.

Then those Federal education dollars go back to the States and are administered by various State bureaucrats, and States have to comply with more Federal rules and regulations. They have to hire people to accomplish that. So of the education dollar, the States, by Federal mandate, are required to take their portion out of the equation, as well.

By the time those dollars actually get to a child or actually get to the school district, the principal and the superintendent, of course, they have to file reports with the Federal government, as well. If they have lots of mandates and rules and regulations, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania earlier pointed out, local school districts have to hire people to comply with those Federal education rules and regulations, also.

What we found here in Congress is by the time an education dollar goes through that whole process of being paid by a taxpayer and going back to their home States, there is only about 30 to 35 percent of that education dollar left. That is about it.

People back home believe that they are working hard and they want to believe that the dollars they spend are helping children back home, but in reality this is what is coming home, just a couple of bites of the apple. The rest is cut up in little chunks and pieces, and bureaucrats all over Washington, D.C. get their bellies full and they are comfortable with these education dollars, but the children get a small percentage left over.

We want to make this percentage bigger. In fact, we want to make it as close to 100 percent as we possibly can to help children back home.

Mr. KINGSTON. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield further, as I listen to the gentleman I remember my days as a volunteer for United Way. United Way, for every dollar someone contributes, it uses less than 10 cents for administration. Ninety cents on that dollar goes to the victim, the social service recipient, the person in need, 90 cents.

I would love to see the Washington bureaucracy adopt the United Way standard, because if we did, then I think there would be enough money to do everything to keep everybody satisfied.

Mr. SCHAFFER. We really should. Then there is the question of mandates. If I can use a bit of one of these apples, again, I will use the 35 percent that goes to the classroom and start there, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania pointed out, in reality, when we talk about all of the dollars that end up in a classroom, most of those dollars are State and local dollars. The Federal government, through this process that I mentioned, really sends about 6 to 7 percent of the classroom budget, or is responsible for 6 to 7 percent of the classroom budget. Yet, for this little amount of funding in every classroom comes the vast majority of the mandates that principals and teachers and superintendents have to deal with.

Again, for this little bit of money we get this much rules and regulations. It makes no sense. For many administrators that I speak with, that is the greatest thing they ask for. They do not even ask for more money. When it comes right down to it, they just want more freedom, more flexibility, more liberty, to be able to use those dollars in a way that they see fit.

And that brings us back to the original point of tonight's special order, is that the Republican Party here in Congress desperately wants to help children and reach out to school districts and the classrooms. We want to get those dollars to the districts in a way that allows them to spend them in the way that they see fit. But forcing States to spend the money the way the White House wants will result in more headlines like we see today in New York going to individuals who are really not teachers at all, folks who are in classrooms who are uncertified, incapable of teaching. They are only there because somebody in Washington dished out the cash in large proportions and invited someone else to spend it.

Mr. Speaker, the children really do not matter in this headline and we think that is wrong. We want children to matter all across the country and we want to see headlines that are positive and talking about the great growth and the world's best schools. That is our goal and dream for our children and our country, and that is the goal to which we are most dedicated.

With that, Mr. Speaker, I thank those who have joined me in this special order tonight.

SMALLER CLASSES NOT AN EDUCATION PANACEA

There is little evidence that smaller classes help students, says education expert Chester E. Finn Jr., and reducing class size may even hurt student achievement if the new teachers are mediocre. Yet President Clinton has proposed shrinking classes in the early grades to 18 students per teacher by hiring 100,000 more teachers at federal expense for seven years.

After reviewing the relevant research, economist Eric Hanuskek of the University of Rochester concluded ''there is little systematic gain from general reduction in class size.''

Class size has been shrinking for decades—the national average is now 22 kids per classroom, down from more than 30 in the 1950s—at immense cost, but with no comparable gain in achievement.

In fact, the Asian countries that trounce the U.S. on international education assessments have vastly larger classes, often 40 or 50 per teachers.

And in California, When Gov. Pete Wilson shrank class sizes, veteran teachers left inner-city schools in droves, lured by higher pay and easier working conditions in suburban schools that suddenly had openings.

One or two studies that suggest fewer kindergarten children in a classroom is linked with modest test-score gains, says Finn; but more research is necessary before it can be said its efficacy has been proven.

Alternatively, Finn suggests the $12 billion in new federal spending Clinton proposes would be better spent to fund $4,000 scholarships for 425,000 low-income students for seven years. Or it could be used to improve teaching by providing a $4,500 college tuition grant for every one of the nation's 2.7 million teachers.

That would be useful. Finn points out, because the Department of Education reports that 36 percent of public-school teachers of academic subjects neither majored nor minored in their main teaching field.

DO NOTHING CONGRESS: AN UNFINISHED AGENDA

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the Speaker's announced policy of January 6, 1999, the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. PALLONE) is recognized for 60 minutes as the designee of the minority leader.

Mr. PALLONE. Mr. Speaker, I want to spend some time this evening talking about the unfinished agenda for this Congress, because it is very likely that if not this week, then certainly very soon this Congress and this House of Representatives will be in recess. I am hoping that we will be able to complete the budget and the various appropriations bills that remain out there that have not been finalized here in the House of Representatives. But my point that I am trying to make tonight is this Republican leadership, because the Republicans are in the majority in the House of Representatives and they do lead the House of Representatives as well as the Senate, and essentially what we see is that the Republicans are determined to do nothing.

Mr. Speaker, they have not been able to pass the appropriations bills. They have not been able to essentially pass a budget, even though the fiscal year began October 1. And, if anything, when we try to pass measures that are important to the American people such as Medicare prescription drug benefits or HMO reform Patients' Bill of Rights or campaign finance reform or gun safety laws that would make a difference for the American people and that the public is crying out for in most cases, what we see is that the Republicans get dragged along reluctantly to do perhaps something about these issues, but ultimately do not do anything about it or manage somehow to make it so that none of this legislation, none of this positive agenda pushed by the Democrats ever becomes law.

Mr. Speaker, I just want to give some examples, if I can, about the problems that we are facing with this Republican leadership and with this unfinished agenda.

What I find is that the Republican leadership basically seems to be dominated by the far right, the ultraconservatives within the Republican Party. They constantly talk about the need for tax cuts that primarily benefit the wealthy and the larger corporations. They constantly talk about the need to get rid of government, couched somehow in that there are too many government restrictions and so the best thing is to get rid of all the restrictions and ultimately get rid of the government.

They get dragged into somehow passing sometimes, after a long period of effort on the part of the Democrats, into passing legislation like the Patients' Bill of Rights for HMO reform. But then they manage when it goes to conference between the House and the Senate to muck it up so nothing ever gets to the President's desk.

Essentially what we have is a ''do nothing Congress.'' And it is also the ''wrong thing Congress'' because the Republicans have the wrong agenda. They do not want to adopt the Democrats' agenda and adopt legislation that helps the American people. They want to adopt the wrong agenda.

Mr. Speaker, I suppose the biggest example of that wrong agenda is the tax cut. Over the summer the Republican leadership proposed and eventually passed narrowly a trillion dollar tax cut for special interests that benefited their wealthy corporate contributors, but not 1 cent to extend the life of Social Security or to modernize Medicare with a prescription drug plan. Instead of allowing debate on a plan that would allow seniors to buy prescription drugs at an affordable cost, Republicans joined with the pharmaceutical industry to belittle the need for such a plan under Medicare in the first place.

The Republicans fought tooth and nail to derail a bipartisan Patients' Bill of Rights that would have taken medical decision-making away from insurance company bureaucrats and returned it back to doctors and patients where it belongs.

They have sat on, as I mentioned, common sense gun control to please the gun lobby. More than 6 months after the Columbine, Colorado incident, Republicans in Congress have still blocked any progress on keeping guns out of the hands of children and criminals by shutting the gun show loophole.

Mr. Speaker, what we are seeing here is this Republican Congress is all about inaction, indifference and inertia. Democrats really have said over and over again we are not going to go home, we are not going into recess here until we get a budget agreement that addresses some of the outstanding priorities for American families. I know some of the previous speakers here on the other side of the aisle tonight have belittled the 100,000 teachers program and said it is not necessary, adding 100,000 teachers to bring down classroom size. Well, they may belittle it, but we are not going home until we pass it and we have the extra teachers to give to the communities to reduce class size.

Some have even belittled the Cops on the Beat program saying it gives money to the towns to hire extra policemen, 50- to 100,000 extra policemen, but they only get it a few years and after that they do not have the money any more. Well, again the idea of adding police and giving some Federal dollars back to the municipalities so they can hire extra police or extra teachers, there is no reason why those programs cannot continue if the Republican leadership was willing to continue to fund them for the municipalities, help the towns reduce their property tax rate, provide more cops and more teachers.

And of course we also have the other initiatives, the Democratic initiative to provide funding for school modernization, to provide more money for open space so that communities, counties, States can purchase more property for open space.

Mr. Speaker, I am going to go into some of these issues tonight in the time that I have. I am not going to use all of the time, but I am going to go into some of the details about how the Republican agenda is this ultraconservative, right wing agenda, mainly tax cuts for the rich, and how they have not really dealt with the average problems or the concerns of the American people.

Let me talk a little bit about this Republican tax cut, because what I find is that my colleagues on the other side of the aisle, they want to sort of forget that they put together this trillion dollar tax cut primarily for the wealthy. They talked about it a lot over the summer, but I guess they realized it did not work and the American public did not want it, so they do not talk about it much anymore.

Just a little bit about it. It was primarily, overwhelmingly I should say, skewed towards the wealthy and corporations. It meant $46,000 extra per year for the wealthiest taxpayers but only $160 per year for the average middle-class family. And there were $21 billion in special interest tax breaks for big business.

The other thing, of course, is that what they do when they enact this trillion dollar tax cut, which the President wisely vetoed, is that that does not leave any money in the surplus that can be used to pay down the national debt. The President said that he wanted to use the surplus that was generated by the Balanced Budget Act to pay down the national debt, to shore up Social Security and Medicare.

Well, so much of that surplus, the whole thing was basically taken up by the Republican tax cut for the wealthy that the effort to reduce the national debt, if that ever were passed and was not vetoed by the President, would simply go out the window. It also siphoned money from the President's Medicare and Social Security program.

The President proposed in his State of the Union address that whatever surplus there was generated by the Balanced Budget Act over the next 5 or 10 years primarily would be used to shore up Social Security, because we know that in maybe 20 or 30 years there will not be enough money to pay for the people who are then seniors who reach the age of 65. He also wanted to use about 15 percent of that surplus for Medicare in part to provide a new prescription drug program.

I will just mention this by way of background, because I know the Republicans do not like to remember that tax cut. But if that tax cut had ever passed and had gone primarily to the wealthy and the special interest corporations, we would not be able to pay down the national debt which we are doing to some extent now, we would not be able to provide money for the Social Security system in the future, and we would not be able to pay for a prescription drug plan.

Now, I want to talk a little bit about two of the issues that I consider very important here, which are not part of the Republican leadership agenda, which are part of the Democratic agenda and which the Republicans continue to try to muck up so they do not become law. One is managed care reform and the other is the prescription drug benefit under Medicare for seniors.

Interestingly enough, last week we saw an interesting development with regard to the managed care reform. I think my colleagues and most of the American people know that the Democrats along with some Republicans because there was definitely bipartisan support on this HMO reform, on a bipartisan basis, but not with the support of the Republican leadership but a minority of the Republicans, we put together a managed care reform bill, the Patients' Bill of Rights, that passed the House of Representatives overwhelmingly about a month ago.

Well, the problem is once a bill passes here, we have to go to conference with the Senate and try to work out the differences between the two Houses. We call that a conference, the people who are appointed are called conferees. The Republican leadership never appointed any conferees for about a month because they did not want to move forward on the conference because they did not want a managed care reform bill to be passed by both Houses and go to the President for a signature.

But, finally, because the Democrats kept pressuring about the appointment of the conferees, they finally did decide last week that they would appoint the conferees. But they managed, once again, to screw this thing up so that the conference either will never take place or will never be effective in putting together a bill that would go to the President and that would signal real managed care reform.

If my colleagues do not want to take my word for it, let me point out that last Thursday's New York Times had a great article, a congressional memo sort of a feature column by David Rosenbaum, and I will quote a few salient passages. The title of the article is ''Not Quite Business as Usual in House on Managed Care.'' This is how he describes it in his article:

And I quote: ''Here is how the textbooks say a bill becomes law: The Senate passes the bill. Then the House of Representatives passes its own version. Then a conference committee is formed where senior senators defend their bill and senior representatives defend their bill, with both sides striking compromises to resolve their differences.''

That is what I was describing before about how we go about the conference.

''But in the real world,'' he goes on to say, ''in the real world of power politics, conventional procedures are sometimes flouted. That is what happened in the House today on legislation expanding the rights of patients in managed care plans. It threatens to undo the Chamber's action on the bill. Last month, by a lopsided vote of 275 to 151, the House passed a bill that would give patients a wide range of new rights in dealing with their health insurance companies. In July, the Senate had passed a bill covering barely a quarter as many patients and giving them a much more limited set of rights.''

''The House bill was strongly supported by President Clinton, and almost all Democrats and 68 Republicans voted for it. But Republican Leaders in the House opposed the measure, making its passage probably the most striking rebuff to the leadership since the party won control of the Congress in 1994.''

So the House leadership did not like what we call the Norwood-Dingell bill, named for the two chief sponsors, one Republican, the gentleman from Georgia (Mr. NORWOOD), and one Democrat, the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. DINGELL). The House leadership did not like the bill. They stalled, they stalled. Finally the bill passes overwhelmingly. So what do they do?

Going back to The New York Times. ''Today, these leaders,'' Republican Leaders, ''used their authority to make sure the Republican conferees named to negotiate with the Senate were on their side and not on the side that won the vote, a tactic that could effectively stifle any action regulating managed care plans in this Congress.'' They are going to kill the bill.

''The chief Republican sponsor of the measure, Representative Charlie Norwood of Georgia, was denied a seat on the conference committee. So was another leading Republican supporter, Representative Greg Ganske of Iowa. Of the 12 Republican conferees, 10 voted against the managed-care bill.''

So what they did through a procedural gimmick is the Republican leadership made sure that if the conference is ever held, which it may not be, that whatever comes out will be controlled by the people who voted against the very bill that passed overwhelmingly in the House of Representatives.

''The rules of the House state:'' and I am going back to the New York Times article, that ''In appointing Members to conference committees, the Speaker shall appoint no less than a majority of Members who generally support the House position as determined by the Speaker. Technically, Mr. Hastert followed that rule. The managed-care regulations were attached to a separate bill, which Republicans call access legislation, that will increase coverage for the uninsured.''

Now, what they are basically doing here is a gimmick. They put the managed care reform bill in another bill. They are saying that most Republicans voted for that, so that is okay. They do not have to have conferees that supported the managed care reform.

Mr. Speaker, again, I only use this as an example. I could use campaign finance reform. I could use prescription drug benefits. I could use gun safety laws. The list goes on. Basically whatever positive agenda there is for the American people, the Republican leadership is determined that they are going to kill it.

Now, let me just mention another issue that I consider very important and that I think we are starting to see more and more information that tells us about the problems that seniors have trying to purchase and have enough money or insurance to provide for prescription drugs.

Well, we are just seeing more and more information coming out every day about how difficult this problem is for seniors, because Medicare does not cover prescription drugs in most cases.

Interestingly enough, a report came out last week by Families USA called ''Hard to Swallow Rising Drug Prices for American Seniors.'' I would just like to provide some of the information that was in the introduction or the summary of this report that came out last week because it shows dramatically how seniors increasingly cannot afford the cost of prescription drugs and are going without.

We all know that prescription drugs are really the best preventative measure that one can take, particularly as a senior, to avoid hospitalization, to avoid having to go to a nursing home, to avoid being institutionalized. They are a preventative. If seniors cannot afford them, they are going to end up in a hospital, they are going to end up in a nursing home, they are not going to be able to take the preventative action that comes from having access to prescription drugs.

Well, the Families USA report, if I can just quote, Mr. Speaker, some of the salient points. This is in the introduction, which I thought was particularly significant. It says that, ''For older Americans, the affordability of prescription drugs has long been a pressing concern. Outpatient prescription drug coverage is one of the last major benefits still excluded from Medicare, and the elderly are the last major insured consumer group without access to prescription drugs as a standard benefit. It is not included in Medicare.

''Although many Medicare beneficiaries have access to supplemental prescription drug coverage, too often that coverage is very expensive and very limited in scope. What is more, such coverage is on the decline. As a result, older Americans who are by far the greatest consumers of prescription drugs pay a larger share of drug costs out of their own pockets than do those who are under 65.

''Four years ago, Families USA found that the prices of prescription drugs commonly used by older Americans were rising faster than the rate of inflation. To determine if this trend of steadily increasing prices for prescription drugs has improved, remained the same, or worsened, Families USA gathered information on the prices of prescription drugs most heavily used by older Americans over the past 5 years.

''Our analysis shows that, in each of the past 5 years, the prices of the 50 prescription drugs most used by older Americans have increased considerably faster than inflation. While senior citizens generally live on fixed incomes that are adjusted to keep up with the rate of inflation, the cost of the prescription drugs they purchase most frequently has risen at approximately two times the rate of inflation over the past 5 years and more than four times the inflation over the last 2 years.''

Now, just again to show my colleagues how bad the situation is becoming for seniors, just a little more information that comes from the discussion in this Families USA report, it says that ''because Medicare does not cover outpatient prescription drugs, many beneficiaries look elsewhere for drug coverage. About 28 percent of the Medicare beneficiaries receive some drug coverage through employer-sponsored retiree plans, about 11 percent from Medicaid, about 8 percent from individuals purchasing Medigap insurance, about 7 percent from Medicare HMOs, and about 3 percent from public sources such as the VA or State pharmaceutical programs for the low-income elderly,'' something that we have in New Jersey.

But 35 percent of Medicare beneficiaries, 14 million people, have absolutely no coverage for prescription drugs. Interestingly enough, even for those 65 percent who do have access to some drug coverage, what the Families USA report shows is that much of that inadequate with high co-payments, low caps on overall drug coverage, and restrictions on the drugs that can be prescribed.

For example, only three of the 10 standardized Medigap policies sold offer prescription drug coverage, two of these policies require a $250 annual deductible, charge a 50 percent co-payment for each drug, and have a maximum annual benefit of $1,250. The third, which has a much higher premium, has the same high deductible and co-payment and has a $3,000 cap.

So what we are finding is that the sources of prescription drug coverage for seniors are basically drying up. Next year the value of drug benefits and Medicare HMOs will decline. On average co-payments for brand-name drugs will increase by 21 percent, and co-payments for generic drugs will increase by 8 percent.

I do not want to continue going through this, but I think this Families USA report shows dramatically how so many seniors do not have any access to prescription drug coverage and they are simply paying everything out-of-pocket, which they cannot afford; or for those who have some sort of coverage, the prices, the cost, the co-payments, the deductibles, and even the ability to obtain coverage at all, all those factors, everything is declining. We have to do something about it.

Well, the President has proposed doing something about it, and the Democrats have proposed doing something about it. This is part of our positive agenda which we cannot get passed in the Republican Congress with this Republican leadership.

The President a long time ago, much earlier this year, came up with the idea of a Medicare prescription drug benefit. He wanted to establish a new voluntary Medicare Part D prescription drug benefit that is as affordable and available to all beneficiaries.

Now, I am not saying that the President's proposal is necessarily the one we should adopt, but the Republican leadership does not want to adopt anything. They say the problem does not exist or make some other excuse.

But I will just give my colleagues a little information about the President's proposal because I think it is a good one. He says that there would be no deductible, and Medicare would pay for half of the beneficiary's drug cost from the first prescription filled each year up to $5,000 in spending.

He would ensure beneficiaries a price discount similar to that offered by many employer-sponsored plans for each prescription purchased even after the $5,000 limit is reached.

I want to stress how important that is to be able to do bulk purchases and keep the prices down, because price discrimination is a huge problem right now for seniors if they do not have access to some kind of plan where the purchases are made in bulk.

The plan that the President proposed will cost about $24 per month beginning in 2002 and $44 per month when fully phased in by 2008. Beneficiaries with incomes below 135 percent of poverty would not pay premiums or cost sharing.

I do not want to, again, go into all the details, but I just did want to say that, to date, once again, the Republican leadership has failed to show even the slightest understanding of the two broad underpinnings of this prescription drug issue; and that is the price discrimination that seniors face in purchasing prescription drugs and the need to establish a comprehensive Medicare drug benefit in order to help seniors combat this price discrimination.

There have been some dramatic examples. The Government operations, the House Committee on Government Reform did a lot of analysis of price discrimination and basically showed that, if one goes to Mexico and Canada, generally the same exact drugs that were available in those countries are available for about half the cost of what they are sold for here in the United States.

Again, I do not want to go into all the details on this, Mr. Speaker, but I just would point out that the problem with price discrimination exists because seniors without coverage have no negotiating power. They do not have the power to obtain pharmaceuticals at lower prices through bulk purchases like the drug industry's most favorite customers. We have to address that. This Republican leadership has failed to address it.

I do not intend to use all the time allotted to me this evening, but I just wanted to spend a few more minutes talking about what is really happening here. Not only is this Republican leadership not addressing the real issues that need to be addressed like managed care reform, like Medicare prescription drugs; but they cannot even perform the basic functions of the House in terms of getting the budget passed. They continue to break their promises that they make in trying to accomplish that goal.

We are now on the fourth CR, the fourth continuing resolution. As of October 1, the new fiscal year began. The new budget, the 13 appropriations bills were supposed to be adopted by October 1. They were not. Every week or so, we pass a new continuing resolution to keep the Government going and not close down for another week or so. Now we are on our fourth that extends, I believe, to November 10, sometime this week, in time for Veterans' Day when we probably will recess.

The fact that we are in such disarray, and we have not been able to adopt the budget is bad enough; but there are two things about what has been going on that I think need to be highlighted that maybe in some respects are even worse.

The two promises that basically the Speaker made and the Republican leadership made earlier in this year about the budget, both of which have been broken, one is that the appropriations bill would stay within the Balanced Budget Act and the caps that were set forth pursuant to the Balanced Budget Act so that we would not exceed the level of spending that was basically put forth and outlined over the next 5 or 10 years on an annual basis. There were caps on the level of spending that were put forth for each fiscal year.

Well, the Republican appropriation bills have already busted the outlays caps for fiscal year 2000 by billions of dollars. I have actually an article in the Wall Street Journal that talks about this. I think I will just put it up here for a minute, Mr. Speaker.

This is from Friday, October 29, Wall Street Journal. I think people generally understand that the Wall Street Journal tends to be Republican and tends to be conservative. This is an article there that says that, ''The Congressional Budget Office estimates that the GOP exceeds spending targets by over $31 billion. Congressional Budget Office estimates show that Republicans are more than $31 billion over their initial spending targets for this year, risking the Government having to borrow again from Social Security.

''Prior appropriations bills have exceeded Mr. Clinton's requests from funding everything from veterans' medical care and the Pentagon to the Environmental Protection Agency. Even with the 1 percent across-the-board cut that the Republicans touted here a couple weeks ago, the Labor Education Health bill, which is expected to be passed by the Senate on Monday, includes major spending increases over the last year.

''The GOP continues to work to what amounts to two sets of book, this is the gimmicks, one based on the CBO and the other on spending estimates by the Office of Management Budget. When the OMB's numbers are favorable, House and Senate budget committees simply direct CBO to adjust the estimates accordingly.'' Well, it goes on.

The point I am trying to make, Mr. Speaker, is that there is absolutely no question that based on the CBO estimates that the Republicans spending bills have busted the fiscal year 2000 outlays, the caps, by $30.7 billion. They use all kinds of gimmicks to try to justify that as emergencies or whatever.

Now, the second promise that the Republicans made was that they were not going to dip into the Social Security Trust Fund. On October 28, the Congressional Budget Office certified that the GOP leadership had broken that program. They sent a letter to Congress certifying that, on the basis of CBO estimates of the 13 completed GOP appropriation bills, the GOP bills spend $17 billion of the Social Security surplus, even after their 1 percent across-the-board cut is taken into consideration.

Mr. Speaker, I just wanted to go into this a little bit, and then I will complete my presentation this evening. There was an article, I guess it was in the New York Times last week, that talked about how these spending limits that were set forth with much fanfare as part of the Balanced Budget Act a couple years ago have just basically been ignored.

Many of us at the time when the Balanced Budget Act was passed thought this was going to be really significant in terms of trying to keep the budget focused, not go into debt, create a surplus that could be used to shore up Social Security and Medicare, to pay for prescription drugs, whatever. But what we see is that the caps are effectively dead.

If one looks at this article in the New York Times from last week, it says that ''In effect, Washington has now substituted a new standard of fiscal responsibility, the loser goal of not spending surplus Social Security money. Only through budget gamesmanship can either party claim to be meeting even that new standard this year.''

Well, just to give my colleagues an idea of some of the thing that they have done to get away the caps, the article says that, ''Under the law, Congress and the administration must remain within the caps, or the White House must enact the across-the-board cuts to bring spending back into line.''

Last year, the Republican leadership exploited a loophole intended to deal with wars or natural disasters. They designated $20 billion in outlays as emergency spending that is not technically subject to the limits. They did the same thing this year.

Appropriations committees have almost arbitrarily placed $17.5 billion in discretionary spending, including spare parts for the Pentagon, financing for the 2000 census under the emergency umbrella.

They have also used a tactic that compares spending estimates, this is what was in the Wall Street Journal as well, where they look at the CBO numbers versus the OMB numbers, and they use whatever numbers they think are appropriate to try to say that they are not sending money. Whatever.

The point I am trying to make, Mr. Speaker, is that we are here on this fourth continuing resolution. It is over a month since the budget was supposed to be fashioned. All we keep hearing from the other side is that, oh, we are going to stay here because we do not want to dip into Social Security. The reality is they have already dipped into Social Security about $17 billion.

The last thing I wanted to mention tonight, and I go back to the Social Security issue again because I know some of my colleagues on the Democratic side have been attacked by Republican commercials, accusing them of dipping into Social Security when, in fact, it is the Republican leadership that has dipped into Social Security with their appropriations and their spending bills to the tune of $17 billion.

And there was a good article, again an editorial in The New York Times last week, that talked about the focus on this Social Security surplus and dipping into it. The New York Times pointed out, again, that the Republicans have already dipped into the Social Security surplus so that that whole issue is really moot. But what they say is the most important aspect and the best example of inaction here is how we are not dealing with the long-term solvency of Social Security.

There again, I go back to what the President said in his State of the Union message earlier this year. He said, look, we can take the majority of the surplus that is being generated from the Balanced Budget Act over the next 10 years and we can use that to shore up Social Security so the trust fund remains viable, and 20 or 30 years from now, when all the baby boomers become senior citizens, or even sooner, there will be money there for Social Security; and we can use a significant portion of the surplus also for Medicare so we can have a prescription drug benefit.

All I would like to conclude with tonight, Mr. Speaker, is to say, please, to my colleagues on the other side, to the Republican leadership that runs this House of Representatives, before we leave here, let us adopt a budget, but let us also make sure that we address some of these both short-term and long-term issues that need to be addressed. All the Democrats are saying is that we are crying out for bipartisan action on Social Security to make sure that we address the solvency long-term on Medicare, to make sure we provide a prescription drug benefit, address campaign finance reform, address the gun safety issue, address the concerns with regard to HMOs and pass the Patients' Bill of Rights.

Let us get active on an agenda. Let us not just sit back and say that this House of Representatives and this Congress should run away from everything and the government should basically dismantle itself and not try to take some action in a positive way that would benefit the American people.

I do not want to come here every day and see us fool around with appropriations bills and not pass a budget, and at the same time not address these major concerns that should be addressed, and that is what we are seeing here every day amongst the Republican leadership; inaction on the budget, gimmicks on the budget, no action on the major issues that are important to the American people.

And worst of all, last week the Speaker again started to talk about a major tax cut, as if the only thing that this Republican leadership could do is to talk about another tax cut that is going to benefit primarily the wealthy and provide corporations with some tax breaks. It is almost as if the only thing that the Speaker and the Republican leadership can think about at any given time is coming up with more tax cuts.

That is not what needs to be done. We need to address the issues that the public is crying out for, and I hope that we do, otherwise we will be continuing to speak out on the Democratic side of the aisle every night to demand action on these important issues that the American people want to see attended to.

THE BUDGET

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. SIMPSON). Under the Speaker's announced policy of January 6, 1999, the gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. SHAYS) is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. SHAYS. Mr. Speaker, this is the first time I think all year I have taken a special order. I have done a number in past years, but I am very grateful to have the time to do this.

Before I discuss the budget, which I intend to talk about in my special order, I would just make the comment that quite often the criticism on the other side of the aisle is that we spend too much or we are not spending enough. And it is really important, I think, for the other side of the aisle to decide on one of their arguments and then we can have an honest debate about it. We want an across-the-board 1 percent cut, and yet we are hearing on the other side of the aisle that we should not make that reduction; yet we are also hearing that we are spending too much.

Before I talk about my budget, we have the chairman of the Committee on Education and the Workforce, the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. GOODLING), really the most informed and most dedicated person on the issue of education, and I would like to give him an opportunity to make some comments on what we are doing in education.

Mr. GOODLING. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding to me.

One of the most frustrating experiences I have had in my entire career in the Congress of the United States is to see us, and in very well meaning efforts, budget billions of dollars and then appropriate billions of dollars to try to reduce the gap between the advantaged and the disadvantaged students in this country and to sit there and realize that no matter how well meaning the attempt was, in many instances it was wrong from day one.

We know that, and knew from the very beginning, that the manner in which we were trying to deal with Head Start was not going to give the youngsters a head start. We knew very well that it became a poverty jobs program instead of a program to make sure that disadvantaged youngsters and poor youngsters had an opportunity to become reading ready before they went into a failing 1st grade experience.

We did the same thing with Title I, more than $120 billion. Again, we realized in many instances that that became a poverty jobs program rather than a program to reduce the achievement gap between advantaged and disadvantaged youngsters. And, in fact, unfortunately, we even have examples of where the opposite happened; that the gap even widened.

That is why it is so difficult for me now to watch us make the same mistake with the 100,000 teacher idea that is presented by the administration. I am not certain that my colleagues realize that in the first group where the contracts were let, it is somewhere between 21,000 and 29,000 new teachers, we cannot quite find out exactly how many it is, but there was no accountability whatsoever. The only requirement was a reduction of class size.

Well, everybody knows that if a parent has an opportunity to have their child in a classroom with a quality teacher with 28 students, or they have an opportunity to have their child in a classroom with 18 students with mediocrity leading that class, parents are going to choose the quality teacher. But every one of those grants that went out, nothing was asked in return in relationship to we will improve the academic achievement of all of these students, the most needy students, the most disadvantaged students. They just had to reduce class size.

So we came to the floor of the House and, with a bipartisan effort, passed the Teacher Empowerment Act. And in that act we said the first responsibility, the major responsibility, is to reduce class size, but do not do it unless a qualified teacher can be put in that classroom; and do not do it if there is no classroom to put the new teacher in. As a matter of fact, if it must be used, use it to improve the quality of the teachers presently in the system.

And today the headline in the New York Daily News is ''Not Fit to Teach Your Kid. In some city schools 50 percent of teachers are uncertified.'' And all we are doing is adding to that lack of certified, lack of qualified teachers in the classroom by merely saying take this money, reduce class size, it does not matter who it is that is teaching in that classroom.

Now, I would imagine that of this 50 percent there are probably 25 percent of those people who could become very excellent teachers in a very difficult situation if they could divert money to properly prepare and train them to teach. One of the requirements the State says is that we will require that, for instance, a high school teacher has to be certified to teach the subject they are teaching. Big deal. I would hope so. I would hope a math teacher or a science teacher is certified and qualified and knows how to teach math and knows how to teach science.

But all we do with the 100,000 teachers is say they must reduce class size. It does not matter where there is inequality. And that is a tragedy, because we know that cannot work. We know that they have to have the flexibility to use some of the funds to properly prepare the teachers that they have. This city would not have 50 percent uncertified teachers. They do not do that because they want that to happen, they do it because they do not have qualified teachers and they cannot get certified teachers.

And, of course, just being certified does not mean they are qualified. However, what it does mean is that the State of New York has said that the minimal requirement they should have before they go before a class as a teacher is what the State has outlined. These 50 percent do not have those minimal qualifications.

So I would hope, and again this is a budget issue, this is an appropriations issue, but, gee, let us do something about closing that gap between the advantaged and the disadvantaged. Let us not just give lip service to the fact that if somehow or other we reduce class size all of that will happen.

The most important person in a child's life is, first, the parent; second, is a quality teacher; and, third, and we do this in Even Start, those who are parents that are not able to prepare their child for a good learning experience by the time they reach first grade we also say we need to help make sure that that parent is the child's first and most important teacher.

So as we go through this budget debate, as we go through this debate in relationship to appropriations, I hope that we will think about children, and I hope that we will realize that the programs have not worked. And all the auditors have ever done is say the money went to the right place, but they never said we accomplished anything to change that achievement gap.

So again I appeal to the administration. Let us talk in terms of how we make sure that every teacher in that classroom is a qualified teacher so every child has a chance to succeed. And I thank the gentleman for yielding to me.

Mr. SHAYS. It has been my pleasure. Mr. Speaker, when I was elected in 1987, I had had 12 years, actually 13 years experience in the State House in Connecticut, where I was the ranking member of both the appropriations committee and the finance committee. And it amazed me as a member in the State House how Members in Congress could ignore the requirement to get our country's financial house in order. On the State level we simply had to stay within a budget, we had to stay within the flow of funds that presented themselves in terms of revenue.

We are in an extraordinarily interesting time because we have seen a lot happen since 1987 when I was first elected. When I was first elected, I joined forces with my colleague, the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. KASICH), who really led the fight as a minority member at the time, who started to present ways to slow the growth of what we call mandatory spending, which are what others refer to as entitlements and to actually cut what government spends.

When we look at our Federal budget, only one-third is what we vote on each and every year. Over 50 percent are actually on automatic pilot, unless we change the requirements. If a program fits the title, they get the money, whether it is Medicaid, Medicare, Social Security is a retirement system, but if an individual puts into the fund, they are entitled to certain benefits, and there are other entitlements as well. So we have about one-third of the budget that we actually vote on and two-thirds we are just on automatic pilot.

And everyone seemed content to allow that to happen. Part of that automatic pilot was interest on the national debt, which is almost 14 percent of our overall budget.

It was interesting as Congress pre-1987 had adopted Gramm-Rudman. That was a program that was adopted before I was elected. The interesting thing about Gramm-Rudman, it basically said you had to stay within certain budget caps, except it only was on that one-third of the budget. And so what Members started to do is they could not stay within the budget caps of what we vote on in defense and nondefense budgets, the 13 budgets that we work on, so what they did is they started to put things into the entitlements and make the automatic pilot grow even faster and faster.

I would like to go through certain budget charts and I would like to thank my own staff member, Peter Carson, who is my AA, or what we refer to as an AA is really your chief of staff and serves with me on the Committee on the Budget as well as Dick Magee who is on the Committee on the Budget as a staff member and who helped me prepare these charts. I would like to go through 10 charts and describe what has happened since 1992 and what we project out to the year 2009.

What is interesting to me is that when I was elected early on in 1987, we were looking at deficits as far as the eye could see. But just before you had a new Republican majority, the estimates for what that deficit would be are shown in the lower red line on this chart to my right. We were looking at deficits in the estimate in 1992 of $291 billion, then going to $310 billion, $291 billion, but by the year 1999, the year we just concluded, we were looking at deficits of $404 billion. And in the budget we are in the process of adopting, deficits of $455 billion, just in that one year. In other words, $455 billion more money going out than coming into the Federal Government.

When we made the estimates in 1995, we were still looking at deficits, the middle red line, as far as the eye could see, not above the line in which we have more revenue coming in than going out. Even in our estimates in 1997, just before we adopted the balanced budget agreement, we were looking at deficits of $108 billion, $124 billion, $120 billion, $147 billion, ad infinitum. Only deficits. We passed an historic budget agreement in which we slowed the growth of entitlements and we cut government spending. From that, we started to see a significant change.

This second budget chart just shows you the change in revenue estimates based on October 1999 and January 1999. The blue line was the estimate in January 1999. Even then, just within a year, we are seeing a significant increase in the amount that we anticipate, just over a change of 10 months. Revenues are coming in at a much greater rate. They are coming in for a number of reasons. First and foremost, we have an extraordinarily well educated populus that compete with anyone in the world. The cold war is over and admittedly the world is a more dangerous place but we are able to focus more now on economic competition with our trading allies and we are finding that we are quite able to compete. And so revenues are coming in at a much greater rate because of that. But it is also coming in because Congress in particular, and this new Republican majority, quite frankly, put the emphasis on getting our country's financial house in order. We started to reduce our deficits, which started to reduce the interest payments that we have to make, which started to help contribute to lowering interest rates in general and helping to increase the employment rate and decrease the unemployment rate.

This next chart illustrates why this Republican majority is concerned about taxes. Revenues are coming in at an extraordinary rate. People have become quite successful, our businesses are able to compete with the best in the world, and we are seeing a lot of small businesses that are generating awesome economic activity and even our large businesses have become much more efficient and they are able to produce more at a cheaper cost and able to pass on some of that cost savings to consumers and also able to make a profit and to pay their employees more who in turn can buy more goods. But what is of concern to us is in 1945, just at the end of World War II, we had the gross domestic product, revenues constituted 20.4 percent of all of the gross domestic product of our country, 20.4 percent were coming into the coffers of the Federal Government. In 1950, that went down to 14 percent. But you can see that it has gotten back to its all-time high of 20.7 percent, and we anticipate that it is going to continue to grow and grow. The question is, what is going to happen to that revenue?

Now, another chart that illustrates our concern with taxes are the fact that in 1947, if you took all of the Federal, State and local tax revenues, it accounted for 21.7 percent of our gross domestic product. But our Federal, State and local revenues now constitute 31.2 percent. Again, our concern is with the increase in revenue that is coming to both the Federal, State and local government, what is to happen to that revenue? Are we going to spend it and make all three governments larger and larger and larger? Or are we going to look to return some of that revenue back to the taxpayers who are paying that?

The next chart that I want to show is a chart that illustrates Congressional Budget Office estimates since 1992 to the year 2009 of the total amount of receipts coming in with the total amount of outlays, the money going out. The key point is the year 1998, in which for the first time since 1968 that we had more revenue coming in than going out. Now, since 1960, the Federal Government has been spending Social Security reserves. It has been spending it on mandatory spending and it has been spending it on the appropriations expenditures that we have, the 13 budgets. We have been taking since 1960 Social Security money and spending it. Basically it is being used to disguise the overall debt of our country.

But the first thing we had to deal with before we even dealt with that was to just make sure that we had an economist's view of a balanced budget, which was more money coming into the Federal Government than going out. Not only were we spending Social Security money but even with the Social Security money, we were still spending more than was coming in.

So our first objective in the balanced budget agreement of 1997 was to reach that point, that point in which receipts started to overtake outlays. We had a 5-year plan to do it. We passed it in 1997 and we anticipated by the year 2002 that we would finally reach that point in which revenues would exceed our outlays or our expenditures. But it happened in the first year of the balanced budget agreement. In other words, revenues came in at a faster rate than even we anticipated. Again, I raise the question, what is to happen to those revenues? Do we spend them? Do we pay down debt with them? Or do we return them to the American people by cutting taxes?

This chart is really one of the ones I find most interesting, at least in trying to explain why in the world would this Congress want to cut taxes and why by such a large amount of money. The Congressional Budget Office anticipated, and so did the Office of Management and Budget of the President, that in the next 10 years, we would have $3 trillion more money coming in to the Federal Government than going out. Both OMB, the Office of Management and Budget, and CBO, the Congressional Budget Office, both of them agreed that of that $3 trillion, $2 trillion was Social Security money, and $1 trillion was true surplus. In other words, no longer having to spend that Social Security money since 1960, even then we would still have a surplus over the next 10 years of $1 trillion, or almost $1 trillion. Admittedly, in the first year, it would be $147 billion, in the year 2000, rather, $147 billion of Social Security reserves that we would have and not spend, and then $14 billion that was a true tax overcharge, in other words, more money coming in. What is to happen to that $14 billion? What is to happen to the $38 billion in the year 2001? What is to happen to the $28 billion in the year 2002? These are excess moneys, what I call a tax overcharge. We are taxing people more than we are actually going to spend. And then in the year 2005, $92 billion. And in the year 2006, $129 billion. And then 2007, $146 billion; 2008, $157 billion; 2009, $178 billion. What is to happen to that? That amount of money that I have mentioned is marked in red. It was our view that most of it should be a tax cut, we should return it back to the American people.

Now, if I was a dictator, not even President, but if I was a dictator, what would I want to have happen? I would want to take all of this tax overcharge and I would want to pay down debt. That would be my first choice. But I happen to believe that if it is left on the table, it is going to get spent. In fact, the sad part of the story is that is actually what is starting to happen, because the President vetoed our tax cut. So you had $3 trillion, $2 trillion of it is truly for Social Security. What did we do? We took all of this money in this area here, the Social Security surplus, and we took that money and we did not spend it, we paid down debt with it. We reduced the debt of the United States owed to the American people and to businesses and to foreign interests that have helped fund our debt and we just started to pay down those obligations. That is what we want to do, $2 trillion of it. It was this $1 trillion that we debated.

Now, our Republican majority decided that we would provide a tax cut of almost $800 billion, which is about 80 percent of the total amount of what we call the true surplus.

I will illustrate it in another chart. This chart again illustrates the total amount of surplus, and in red is the amount for a possible tax cut. That is what is available. That is what is the true surplus. This part here is the money that we want to reserve for Social Security. The interesting thing is that the budget that we just concluded, we came so close for the first time in not spending Social Security reserves. In fact, the Congressional Budget Office determined that we actually had a true surplus of $1 billion. But the Office of Management and Budget, the office out of the White House, decided that they would hold $2 billion more in reserves, and by doing that, they are saying we are still spending $1 billion of the Social Security surplus. They determined that by simply deciding to hold on to $2 billion more in reserves. But whatever number you are using, whether we use the Congressional Budget Office that said we have truly for the first time since 1960 not spent Social Security, or even using the President's number of only spending $1 billion of it, in other words, even using the President's office, we have had a surplus of $123 billion, a true surplus of $123 billion. Actually, I want to say it differently. We have had a Social Security surplus of $124 billion, and a unified surplus of $123 billion. The White House says we are still spending $1 billion of Social Security money but the Congressional Budget Office says we have spent not $1 billion but actually have saved $1 billion.

Why would we want a tax cut? And how would we compare with the President? When the President presented his budget the beginning of this year, he did not want a tax cut. He wanted a tax increase.

He actually wanted a net tax increase of $52 billion and, over 10 years, it would be $96 billion. So one can imagine our concern when we start seeing more surplus coming in, we are looking in 10 years of a true surplus of $1 trillion; and the President, instead of wanting to return that to the American people still wants to spend $52 billion over 10 years, have a tax increase of $52 billion over 5 years and $96 billion over 10 years. He wants a tax increase; we wanted a tax cut.

Now, our tax cut over 10 years, admittedly, would be $792 billion, about 80 percent of the protected surplus. Over 5 years, it would have been $156 billion. The reason we want that tax cut is, if we do not have a tax cut, it will be spent. It will be spent because Congress, even some of my colleagues on my own side of the aisle have programs they want to spend money on, and if it is left on the table, it will be spent.

Why do I know it will be spent? Because it has been in the past. We have had a budget agreement in 1997 where we had budget caps, but even before the agreement in 1997, we had the pay-go agreement with President Bush that said that one could not increase an entitlement unless one found another way to pay for it; one could not have a tax cut unless one found another way to pay for it.

Now, our problem was not the same in 1990 because we still had a deficit. We want a tax cut because we now have surpluses.

But this is my concern. And one will notice that there is a sharp increase in what happened in the budget of 1999, the one that just concluded. And that sharp increase occurred because a year ago at this time, the President of the United States, just before the congressional elections, decided that he would not agree to a budget unless we spent more. And sadly, too many on both sides of the aisle concurred with the President and agreed to spend more. We have never been within the budget caps because Congress has declared emergencies and Congress has done other approaches that have enabled us to go over the budget caps.

My big concern is this number right here and the trend line. Now, this is where we will be in this new budget agreement; and the question is, will we then go down and actually cut spending, or will it continue to rise? The one value to the budget caps have been that there has been some uniformity at least staying close to them. But sadly, a year ago, when the President demanded more spending, he got it. So why would I want a tax cut and why would other Members want a tax cut? Because if the money is left on the table, it is going to be spent. The sad point is that it is already being spent. All the money that we had reserved for a tax cut in our $800 billion tax cut that we sent the President and he vetoed is now being spent. It is not there for a tax cut.

Let me just show one last chart. This is a good news story, for the most part. It basically is showing what is happening to our national debt. Our national debt is starting to level off and it is starting to level off because we have surpluses, and it is starting to level off because we are going to use the Social Security surpluses and pay down public debt. Our debt to the trust funds continues to rise, but our debt, our public debt is going to fall and continue to fall because we are using the money from the trust funds to now at least pay off debt until we can reform Social Security.

I have a number of concerns about where we are at this point. The good news is that 10 years ago we had extraordinarily large deficits and when we looked at our estimates, those deficits were high then and they were looking to be even larger. We elected a new Republican majority. And I say new Republican majority because this was the first Congress that wanted to look at entitlements and slow their growth and wanted to cut some spending. And the end result has been that we have seen actual surpluses take place.

My concern is that we not begin to designate too much emergency spending that again allows us to go over the caps, that we do not have too many advanced appropriations that begin to appropriate money; the Committee on Appropriations appropriates money, but not spend out over 13 months instead of 12, and that we do not do other items that ultimately make our efforts to balance the budget next year more and more difficult.

The bottom line, we are getting our country's financial house in order. We are seeing an economy that is thriving; we are seeing more and more revenue come into the Federal Government, and what the American people are going to have to decide is what do we do with those surplus monies.

My hope, my prayer, and my votes are going to be to pay down the national debt. But if that is not going to happen, then it must be returned to the American people in tax cuts, because if it is not returned to the American people in tax cuts, then it will be spent as we are seeing happen right now.

What I would like to place ultimately the greatest emphasis on is we have been using Social Security funds since 1960, and we came so close this past year in not spending any Social Security money, according to the Congressional Budget Office, we have not according to the President, given the fact he took $2 billion out in reserves, and we have spent $1 billion of it. But next year, we intend to spend no Social Security money. We are going to use all of that to pay down the public debt. It is not going to be used to pay for programs. We are going to ultimately reduce our total debt.

The question is, what happens to that true surplus, above and beyond Social Security? Will it pay down public debt? Will it be returned to the American people in tax cuts, or will it be spent? And sadly, while we are in next year's budget not going to be paying, using Social Security money to balance our budget, we are not going to be using that money, I am afraid that the money that we had reserved for taxes is now being spent, and it is being spent frankly, in large measure, because my colleagues on the other side of the aisle are critical with our efforts to cut spending, even though they say we are spending too much in certain areas, they have opposed any efforts to try to cut spending or slow the growth in spending.

Mr. Speaker, if we cannot cut spending, if we cannot control the growth in government spending, there will be no money for tax cuts. It will all be spent.

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the ''Electronic Signatures in Global and National Commerce Act''.

TITLE I—VALIDITY OF ELECTRONIC RECORDS AND SIGNATURES FOR COMMERCE

SEC. 101. GENERAL RULE OF VALIDITY.

(a) GENERAL RULE.—With respect to any contract, agreement, or record entered into or provided in, or affecting, interstate or foreign commerce, notwithstanding any statute, regulation, or other rule of law, the legal effect, validity, or enforceability of such contract, agreement, or record shall not be denied—

(1) on the ground that the contract, agreement, or record is not in writing if the contract, agreement, or record is an electronic record; or

(2) on the ground that the contract, agreement, or record is not signed or is not affirmed by a signature if the contract, agreement, or record is signed or affirmed by an electronic signature.

(b) AUTONOMY OF PARTIES IN COMMERCE.—

(1) IN GENERAL.—With respect to any contract, agreement, or record entered into or provided in, or affecting, interstate or foreign commerce—

(A) the parties to such contract, agreement, or record may establish procedures or requirements regarding the use and acceptance of electronic records and electronic signatures acceptable to such parties;

(B) the legal effect, validity, or enforceability of such contract, agreement, or record shall not be denied because of the type or method of electronic record or electronic signature selected by the parties in establishing such procedures or requirements; and

(C) nothing in this section requires any party to use or accept electronic records or electronic signatures.

(2) CONSENT TO ELECTRONIC RECORDS.—Notwithstanding subsection (a) and paragraph (1) of this subsection—

(A) if a statute, regulation, or other rule of law requires that a record be provided or made available to a consumer in writing, that requirement shall be satisfied by an electronic record if—

(i) the consumer has separately and affirmatively consented to the provision or availability of such record, or identified groups of records that include such record, as an electronic record; and

(ii) has not withdrawn such consent; and

(B) if such statute, regulation, or other rule of law requires that a record be retained, that requirement shall be satisfied if such record complies with the requirements of subparagraphs (A) and (B) of subsection (c)(1).

(c) RETENTION OF CONTRACTS, AGREEMENTS, AND RECORDS.—

(1) ACCURACY AND ACCESSIBILITY.—If a statute, regulation, or other rule of law requires that a contract, agreement, or record be in writing or be retained, that requirement is met by retaining an electronic record of the information in the contract, agreement, or record that—

(A) accurately reflects the information set forth in the contract, agreement, or record after it was first generated in its final form as an electronic record; and

(B) remains accessible, for the period required by such statute, regulation, or rule of law, for later reference, transmission, and printing.

(2) EXCEPTION.—A requirement to retain a contract, agreement, or record in accordance with paragraph (1) does not apply to any information whose sole purpose is to enable the contract, agreement, or record to be sent, communicated, or received.

(3) ORIGINALS.—If a statute, regulation, or other rule of law requires a contract, agreement, or record to be provided, available, or retained in its original form, or provides consequences if the contract, agreement, or record is not provided, available, or retained in its original form, that statute, regulation, or rule of law is satisfied by an electronic record that complies with paragraph (1).

(4) CHECKS.—If a statute, regulation, or other rule of law requires the retention of a check, that requirement is satisfied by retention of an electronic record of all the information on the front and back of the check in accordance with paragraph (1).

(a) PROCEDURE TO ALTER OR SUPERSEDE.—Except as provided in subsection (b), a State statute, regulation, or other rule of law may modify, limit, or supersede the provisions of section 101 if such statute, regulation, or rule of law—

(B) specifies the alternative procedures or requirements for the use or acceptance (or both) of electronic records or electronic signatures to establish the legal effect, validity, or enforceability of contracts, agreements, or records; and

(2) if enacted or adopted after the date of enactment of this Act, makes specific reference to this Act.

(b) LIMITATIONS ON ALTERATION OR SUPERSESSION.—A State statute, regulation, or other rule of law (including an insurance statute, regulation, or other rule of law), regardless of its date of enactment or adoption, that modifies, limits, or supersedes section 101 shall not be effective to the extent that such statute, regulation, or rule—

(1) discriminates in favor of or against a specific technology, process, or technique of creating, storing, generating, receiving, communicating, or authenticating electronic records or electronic signatures;

(2) discriminates in favor of or against a specific type or size of entity engaged in the business of facilitating the use of electronic records or electronic signatures;

(3) is based on procedures or requirements that are not specific or that are not publicly available; or

(4) is otherwise inconsistent with the provisions of this title.

(c) EXCEPTION.—Notwithstanding subsection (b), a State may, by statute, regulation, or rule of law enacted or adopted after the date of enactment of this Act, require specific notices to be provided or made available in writing if such notices are necessary for the protection of the safety or health of an individual consumer. A consumer may not, pursuant to section 101(b)(2), consent to the provision or availability of such notice solely as an electronic record.

[Section references correspond to those of the amendment in the nature of a substitute printed in the Congressional Record]

AMENDMENT NO. 2: In section 403A(b)(1) of the Social Security Act, as proposed to be added by section 101(a) of the bill, add at the end the following:

SENATE—Monday, November 8, 1999

The Senate met at 12 noon and was called to order by the President pro tempore [Mr. THURMOND].

PRAYER

The Chaplain, Dr. Lloyd John Ogilvie, offered the following prayer:

Dear God, You have shown us that any week without Your grace and guidance makes us weak. So as we begin this new workweek, we dedicate ourselves to trust in Your goodness, to walk with You humbly, to listen to You attentively, and to serve You obediently. We ask for quiet and peaceful hearts, alert and agile minds, and ready, responsive wills.

Remind the Senators that there is enough time in any one day to do what You require and artesian strength to accomplish what You desire. Free them from tension and tiredness, worry and anxiety. Give spinning wheels good tread. Help them to trust as if everything depended on You and work knowing that You depend on them to accomplish Your best for the Nation.

We love You, Father, and we commit this week to be an expression of that love. You are our Lord and Saviour. Amen.

PLEDGE OF ALLEGIANCE

The Honorable CHUCK HAGEL, a Senator from the State of Nebraska, led the Pledge of Allegiance, as follows:

By a previous consent agreement, the minority leader, or his designee, will be recognized at 3 p.m. to offer an amendment relative to minimum wage, which will then be set aside so that the majority leader, or his designee, can be recognized to offer an amendment relative to business costs. Votes on these amendments have been set to occur at 10:30 on Tuesday. The leader has announced there will be at least one vote at 5:30 p.m. today in relation to the bankruptcy bill.

I thank my colleagues for their attention.

RESERVATION OF LEADER TIME

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HAGEL). Under the previous order, leadership time is reserved.

MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, there will now be a period for the transaction of morning business with Senators allowed to speak for 5 minutes therein.

Under the previous order, the time until 1 p.m. shall be under the control of the Senator from Wyoming, Mr. THOMAS, or his designee.

The Senator from Wyoming.

ACCOMPLISHMENTS OF THE SENATE

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, let me first thank my friend from New Hampshire for coming down. We have morning business now for 2 hours, and we intend to talk about some of the issues before us during this first hour. I am going to at some point—and I hope the Senator will also—talk a little bit about some of the things we have accomplished this year. I understand the media is always interested in the conflicts and where we have controversy. And that is fine. But they do not always talk about the things we have accomplished, the things we have done with the budget, the fact we have spent less in growth this year than we have for a number of years, the fact that we are setting aside Social Security and have proposals out there to strengthen Social Security. We have done a lot for education; indeed, authorized more money to be spent than the administration asked for and allowed for it to be spent on the local level. These are things that are terribly important.

Defense is probably the singular most important thing the Federal Government has to assume. The expenditures of defense have gone down ever since the gulf war. This year we have raised them because in order to fill out the mission the military has, there must be more resources to be able to encourage people to come into the military and to stay there.

We have talked about tax relief, and, indeed, sent to the President a bill which would have given tax relief to all citizens of this country in various ways rather than spending it. Unfortunately, it was vetoed. We will be back with tax relief. When we have an excess amount of money, that is where it ought to go, back to the people who have paid it.

In health care, we have done some things and intend to do more before the week is over; and bankruptcy.

I wish to say I hope before we finish we can put some emphasis on the positive things that we have done for the good of this country.

I yield to my good friend from New Hampshire, who has done a superb job on the appropriations bills, and continues to do so, whatever time he may consume.

Mr. GREGG. I thank the Senator from Wyoming for his courtesy in yielding me some time. I especially thank him for his commitment to making the American people aware through floor statements of how much we have accomplished and how many positive things have occurred in this Congress.

As he mentioned, the most positive is that we have a balanced budget for the first time in generations; that for the first time in years, 20 years or so, the Social Security trust fund money is going to be used for Social Security, which is one of the most important things we could do and thus preserve it for the benefit of senior citizens and the next generation of senior citizens. Something that is really an incredibly positive stride in the way we have dealt with ourselves in this Nation and has led in large part to the economic prosperity that we now experience is the fact that the Government has finally decided to live within its means. That is a result, in my opinion, of a Congress which has aggressively disciplined spending of the Federal Government.

In fact, I recall when this Congress was first elected, a Republican Congress, the President had sent up his budget for the year, and it projected $200 billion deficits for as far as the eye could see. I think the year was 1996, and for the next 10 years it was $200 billion of deficits every year for as far as we could see.

Well, we in the Republican Congress, the first Republican Congress in 40 years, said that was not acceptable; we were going to have to live within our means. Others said it was not doable. We proved it was doable.

That is a positive event. We now have multiple billions of dollars of surplus, a big enough surplus so we will have no impact on Social Security in this budgeting cycle.

What I wanted to speak about, however, beyond the good news, is the issue that has caused us to sort of grind through the process of wrapping up the appropriations bills, specifically the demand by the President in a number of areas of appropriations accounts. The first one I wish to talk about is the demand by the President that we expand his classroom teacher proposal.

Now, the Congress has fully funded to the tune of $1.2 billion. The amount of money that the President initially requested for class size in his original request was for $1.2 billion, the purpose of which was to add teachers to the classroom. Teachers to the classroom may be a good idea in the $1.2 billion that has been put on the table to accomplish that, but the difference between the two sides is not in the dollars; it is in the way those dollars should be spent.

The President's proposal and the proposal coming from the other side of the aisle is that $1.2 billion shall be spent as the people in Washington tell the local people to spend it; it will be spent under a command-and-control process where the administration, the people of the Department of Education, the people of the national labor unions, and the legislators on the other side of the aisle tell the local school districts, tell the States, tell the local principals, tell the local school boards: You must use this money for the purposes of hiring teachers.You must use it for the purposes of hiring teachers. It is a command-and-control, top-down directivefrom Washington telling local school districts how to operate their schools. We, on the other hand, on our side of the aisle, have proposed this $1.2 billion be used for schoolteachers, if that is what the local school district wants. But we have also said—and I will read the language to you—''If the local educational agency determines that it wishes to use the funds for purposes other than class size reduction as part of a local strategy for improving academic achievement, funds may be used for promotional development activities, teacher training, and any other local need that is designated to improve student performance.''

What we are saying on our side of the aisle is that we do not think that a one-shoe-fits-all approach; we don't think that a command-and-control, top-down approach is the right way to manage local education or to manage any education for that matter.

What we believe very strongly is that we should put the dollars on the table. We should make those dollars available to the local schools. And we should say to the local schools: If you need more teachers, here are the dollars to hire those teachers. But if you have determined, under a procedure for obtaining higher academic achievement, you don't need more teachers but what you need are better teachers, and therefore you want to train your teachers, or what you need is to keep a teacher who is about to leave, and therefore you need to pay that teacher a little bit more money, or what you need is a class that has some sort of teacher's aide capability in it, such an individual, but also computer technologies, you should be able to do that.

So we are saying in the context of improving the education, most importantly ''improving the students' performance,'' which is the exact words we use, you can use this money for other areas of teacher enhancement and of assisting teachers to be better teachers.

Why are we saying that? Why aren't we saying what the White House and President Clinton say and what the Senators on the other side of the aisle say, which is you must do it our way; you must hire teachers, and that is what will make for better education? Why aren't we doing that? Because that doesn't work. That doesn't work.

Study after study has concluded that it is not necessarily the class size ratio that is critical to education. It happens to be more than that. I think anybody who has ever been involved in any level of education knows this. It is intuitively obvious through inspection—which was what one of my professors used to say in college, and we used to make fun of him for saying that—that there is a lot more to a classroom than the ratio of teacher to students.

If you have a terrible teacher—I have said this on the floor before—who can't teach you a subject matter, if you put 10 kids with that teacher, or 20 kids with that teacher, they are still not going to learn. If you have an excellent teacher who knows how to handle the subject matter, the odds are that the size of the class, if it varies within five or so children, is not going to affect the quality of that education a whole lot. In fact, this is what studies have shown.

In fact, Eric Hanushek at the University of Rochester, an economist, studied 300 other studies that have been done on this issue and concluded as follows: Looking at 300 different studies, class size reduction has not worked. Furthermore, the quality of the teacher is the most important factor in education, and it is much more important to the class than class size.

A National Commission on Teaching and America's Future found the following: The thing that has the least impact on increasing student achievement, the least impact, is class size. The thing that has the greatest impact is teacher education and the capability of the teacher.

In the State of Washington, which happens to be the home of the sponsor of this original proposal of the top-down control approach, Senator MURRAY's State, a Joint Legislative Audit and Review Committee found: ''High quality teachers and family environment have a far greater effect on student performance than marginally reducing the class size.''

It is not our job in Washington to tell the local school districts that they must hire a teacher so that they can get their class size to some arbitrary number. The President has picked 18 to 1. I note that by picking that number he has managed to qualify 42 of the States already because 42 States already have a class size ratio that is 18 to 1 or better.

There are only nine States and the District of Columbia that do not have the ratio higher than 18 to 1. Arbitrarily, people on that side of the aisle are all knowledgeable and are saying to every school board in America, 18 to 1, and that is it. If you don't have 18 to 1, we are not going to give you the money. You have to hire new teachers, and that is it. That is what it is going to be.

We are saying: Here is the money, American school system. You take that money and you choose whether you need it for a new teacher or whether you need it to make that teacher you already have a better teacher, and you tie it to standards. You tie it to professional development standards and you tie it to student performance standards.

That is a much better way to do it than to try to manage every classroom in America from right here in Washington.

As I said earlier, it is as if those on the other side of the aisle want to take the leader's desk and run a string out to every classroom in America, and that string tells that school what they are going to have to do. If they don't like what it is going to do, they are going to pull that string in running from that desk on the Democratic side of the aisle.

I do not know how many classrooms there are in America. It would probably have to be what? I will take a guess. A million—a million strings running off that desk all over America, intertwined. It is going to get awfully messy and confusing—a big jumbled mess—and nothing is going to happen. We are not going to improve education at all.

I think it is a much brighter idea, it is a much more appropriate idea, and it is a much fairer idea to say to the school systems that happen to know what they are doing because they are involved in it—at least every school district in America that I have ever dealt with is very concerned, first, about education: Here are the dollars. You use it to improve your teachers. You use it to improve your classrooms. You use it, most importantly, to improve student performance.

This is what this debate on the budget has come down to. There really aren't too many other big issues out there today. This is what the whole budget debate has come down to—whether or not we are going to run the classrooms from Washington, whether or not we are going to demand that classrooms across America do exactly what we tell them to do by hiring a new teacher in order to get these funds, or whether we are going to allow the schools across America—the teachers, the principals, the parents, and the school boards—to decide how best to use that money in order to improve teaching in the classroom.

The President has made his stand on this ground. To say the least, I think it is bad ground, a bad idea, and a bad stance.

Ironically, at the same time the teacher and class size issue became a cause celebre for holding up the budget process, the other item holding up the budget process involves the President's demand for 30,000 to 50,000 additional police officers. This is a little bit different. This was before the committee that I chair, the Commerce, State, Justice Committee.

The President put forward a program about 3 years ago. He said we want 100,000 new officers. The Congress agreed with him: Let's try to put 100,000 new officers on the street in America. The Congress funded 100,000 new officers. We put on the table and in the budget the money necessary to pay for 100,000 new officers. The program has run out. The authorization has ended.

The President came forward and said, I want another 30,000 to 50,000 officers on top of the initial 100,000 officers.

First off, there was no program. The Congress didn't agree to that. We agreed to 100,000. We didn't agree to another 30,000 to 50,000. It was a political statement. He held a poll and had some focus group rushing into his office in the morning saying, ''Mr. President,Mr. President, putting police officers on the street really pumps well. Let's do another 30,000 to 50,000.'' That is how they came to the conclusion. They did not have any hearings or even look at the program they have in place because if they had looked at the program they had in place, they would have realized that of the 100,000 officers we put the money on the table for—the Congress did our work to pay for them—the administration has only been able to hire 60,000. They are still 40,000 short of the initial 100,000. But they want to go out and hire another 30,000. They can't do it physically because they haven't been able to hire these offerers. It takes 12 months to do the program. They are not going to get the 100,000 in next year. So they can't possibly do another 30,000 to 50,000.

Equally ironic, where did they find the money in their budget to fund the additional 30,000 to 50,000 officers? Remember, these are local police officers in towns that you and I live in across America. These aren't Federal police officers; these aren't FBI agents or even police officers in this Capitol. These are local police officers. Where did they find the money? They took the money out of the funds we were going to use to fund 1,000 extra Border Patrol agents.

What is the responsibility of the Federal Government? What is our responsibility? It is to protect our borders. Those are Federal agents. Those aren't local agents. Instead of funding the 3,000 new agents who were supposed to be funded and on whom we agreed, for whom we had authorized and appropriated, we were going to appropriate the last 1,000 this year. The administration said: No, we are not going to hire the extra 1,000 Border Patrol agents; we will take the money from that program and put it into hiring an additional 30,000 to 50,000 local police officers for a program that cannot even fulfill its first tranche of police officers, which was supposed to be 100,000.

That is an interesting priority. Think about it. What this administration is saying is, we don't care about the borders as much as we care about putting out a political statement which happens to poll well, which we know has no substantive effect because we know we can't hire the officers. Maybe they didn't know it; they should have. All they had to do was ask the people at the Justice Department. Assume they knew it—putting out a political statement on which we know they cannot fulfill the specifics. They knew, going into this proposal, they could not hire an additional 30,000 to 50,000 officers because they had not even hired the first 100,000 officers. They were 40,000 short, and it takes 12 months to put the officers on the books and bring them on board.

This instead of hiring the Border Patrol personnel to improve our southern borders from being the sieve they are where tens of thousands of illegal aliens come across on a weekly basis. I think it was in the Douglas area of Arizona they arrested nearly 40,000 people in a week. Unbelievable numbers of illegal aliens are coming across the border, placing huge demands on our society in the area of health care, in the area of law enforcement, in the area of schooling. These are huge cost demands on our society, policing those borders so legal immigrants can come across, legal workers can come across. Instead, illegal people are breaking the law to get into this country.

Instead of doing that which happens to be a primary function of the Federal Government, they took the money and used it to set up this specious statement that they were going to add another 30,000 to 50,000 police officers. Now they insist on it. The irony is, they insist on it as part of the budget process wrap-up. They are insisting on adding the extra police officers when they cannot even hire them. Why? PR. It is that simple. It polls well.

The class size statement polls well. On the polling statement, the substance is so fundamentally flawed. They are taking control of local school districts and saying local school districts don't know whether they need a new teacher; we will tell them they need a new schoolteacher. Although they may know they don't need a new teacher, they need to train the teachers better. That philosophy is fundamentally flawed.

The statement to reduce class size is great polling. We will administer cops on the street. Great polling. They are holding up the entire budget of the Government of the United States, which happens to include a lot of other important things.

For example, in my bill, which involves the police officers, we have the funding for the FBI, the funding for the DEA, funding for the INS, funding for the FTC, which is very involved in trying to keep seniors from being fraudulently attacked on the Internet with scams. We have the funding for the FEC, obviously very involved in the different issues of how we manage this e-commerce marketplace in which we are functioning today. We have the funding for the State Department; We have funding for the whole Justice Department, funding for the whole judicial system. All of that is being held up because this administration wants to put out a political statement—not a substantive statement, because they can't do it, as I just pointed out. They cannot accomplish what they claim they will do. They know it. They want a political statement. Then they want to put forward a horrendous policy on class size because it polls well. They are holding up the budget to do that. It is another example of the superficiality of the way this administration approaches issues.

Time and time again for 7 years, we have seen issues put forward not for the purposes of resolving a plan but for the purposes of scoring a political point by this White House. Now they are willing to put at risk the functioning of the entire law enforcement structure of the Federal Government for all intents and purposes over what is basically a political issue, a political statement. It has no substance at all. It has no purpose and can accomplish nothing because it can't be accomplished in this next year. Maybe 2 years from now, when they catch up to doing the full 40,000 officers they still have to do, they can come forward and reasonably say we need another 30,000 officers. That may be true.

Once again, we see the shallowness of this administration is only exceeded by their brazenness. Unfortunately, a number of Federal agencies and the American people will suffer as a result of that.

I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from New Hampshire.

I have to imagine how different the needs of the school district in Wyoming are compared to Philadelphia. I certainly subscribe to the idea we ought to help with the resources, but let the local school districts decide for themselves what it is they need. The basic class size in Wyoming happens to be less than 18.

I am very pleased to have on the floor of the Senate the Senator from Idaho, another western Senator, who is also chairman of our policy committee.

I yield as much time as he desires.

Mr. CRAIG. Mr. President, I thank my colleague from Wyoming for allowing me time this morning.

MICROSOFT

Mr. CRAIG. Mr. President, I have listened to the Senator from New Hampshire speak in what I call the common sense of New Hampshire. I think all Members have been frustrated by this administration running a flag up the pole every morning at the White House to see which way the wind is blowing and then not only attempting to shift Government policy but oftentimes bringing Government to an entire halt until they can determine if the direction in which they are heading is the right direction.

Another example of a misdirected effort by this administration was announced on Friday. I think all Members were paying attention to some degree and were anxious to hear how a Federal judge could decide to run the technological world in which we are living better than the marketplace itself. Sure enough, on Friday, Thomas Penfield Jackson, the judge down at the Justice Department who examined the ins and outs of Microsoft and the marketplace, has determined that Microsoft is a predatory monopoly.

I am no expert in this field, and I am not going to hold myself out on the floor this morning to be so. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD two editorials.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

U.S. DEPARTMENT OF MICROSOFT?

At its highest levels, the educational system is still capable of giving its money's worth, and taxpayers certainly spent enough to educate Thomas Penfield Jackson on Microsoft's struggle to manage what it pleased the judge Friday to call the company's ''monopoly'' in computer operating systems. We guess now the government is going to have to run Microsoft.

We also see the failure of Microsoft's strategy, which was to deny the meaning of its own actions, lest those actions retroactively be found illegal because the court pins the label ''monopoly'' on it. That was unfortunate. Microsoft had a strong case to make that it had behaved in the only way any rational competitor could have.

Microsoft should have argued that we have a monopoly because our customers want us to have one. There is a great deal more software in the world than there would otherwise be, because software designers can invest in creating products knowing there is an installed base of compatible operating systems that won't soon be displaced. And consumers know that they can lay out a thousand bucks or more for a PC without taking a Betamax-vs.-VHS gamble that their investment will be rendered obsolete.

What benefits our consumers is a barrier to our competitors, but as Judge Jackson points out, our real competitor is not ''another product within the same software category, but rather a technological advance that renders the boundaries defining the category obsolete.'' What the judge calls our attempts to maintain our ''applications barrier is entry'' is simply our way of making sure our investment in Windows—and our customers' investment—remains viable in the face of these technological advances. Take our behavior toward Netscape. Browsing the web has become the central purpose of the PC for millions of users. If we had not aggressively promoted our browser, it would have been tantamount to helping Netscape cannibalize our business, using our own platform to render us obsolete while we stood by watching.

If Microsoft cannot act rationally in its own interest, the alternative is a government administrator to take over the business and run it for the benefit of Microsoft's competitors. Outside a Nader thought-bubble, there can't be many people who don't see this cure as worse than the disease. Northwest University Law Professor Larry Downes, writing in USA Today, notes a ''precedent for a remedy of doing nothing; that is, for finding Microsoft guilty but recognizing that there was no court-administered solution that could solve the problem any better than letting the market try to work it out on its own.''

What makes this less than academic is that, even without the government turning Microsoft into a public utility, the paradigm shift is happening and everybody in the business knows it. A host of new developments has already shrunk Microsoft's control over cyberspace, and events are on the way to delivering new forms of web computing that won't even require Windows.

Judge Jackson has deferred the question of whether Microsoft violated the law for a later ruling, but he hasn't left much to the imagination. If he takes his arguments and the incoherent assumptions of antitrust seriously, the only remedy is to turn Windows into a regulated utility, possibly breaking the company up.

No wonder he has repeatedly hinted he would be relieved if the parties would settle. An appeals court would likely overturn any draconian verdict against Microsoft—if a post-Clinton Justice Department hadn't already settled the case. Microsoft has mounted such a lame effort partly because it's relying on the federal circuit court of appeals. On Friday, in a significant ruling related to a private antitrust lawsuit against Intel, that court noted the ''Sherman act does not convert all harsh commercial actions into antitrust violations.''

By the time Microsoft reaches the appellate level, the computing world will have moved on and historians will have to be summoned to remind us what the argument was all about. Judge Jackson will have sat through the antitrust ''case of the century'' only to see it waddle off and expire with a whimper behind some shrub. He can't have that, so he's banging the pots and pans and trying to scare Bill Gates into settling. How much more splendid to be this generation's Judge Greene, tinkering with future releases of Windows the way Judge Green spent 10 years tinkering with AT&T and the baby bells.

But let's get to the real bottom line. Washington's crusade against Microsoft has fulfilled its purpose, serving as a great lever to pry open the wallets of Silicon Valley. Where three years ago the technology plutocrats spent their surplus income on racing yachts and Ferraris and charity, now they patriotically send donations to Washington to support the fixer class and its retinue in the style to which it would like to become accustomed. Steve Case of AOL likes to say the future of technology will be decided in the political arena rather than the marketplace. Be careful what you wish for.

PUNISHING MICROSOFT

(By Robert A. Levy)

Here's the lesson that high-tech companies can glean from Judge Thomas Penfield Jackson's findings in the Microsoft case: If you're sufficiently ambitious, competent, and hard-working; if you're willing to risk your time and fortune; if you succeed at rising above your competition by serving customers with better products; then watch out, because our government will come down on your neck with the force and effect of a guillotine. Judge Jackson's knee-jerk recitation of the Justice Department's line is a mockery of objectivity, scornful of the facts, and congenial only to those who prefer a sterile marketplace in which vigorous competition becomes legally actionable.

Let's start with the judge's big picture: an industry crippled because Microsoft's competitors are unable to innovate. Yet how to explain Netscape's 410 billion price tag, or continued market leadership by Microsoft arch-rivals Oracle, Intuit, AOL, Sun Microsystems, and Real-Networks? How to explain Apple's growth in both sales and profits? Indeed, if Microsoft's ''prodigious market power'' and ''immense profits'' have been used to stifle innovation, then how to explain the incredible success of Linux, which now runs more Web sites than any other server operating system?

In an unguarded moment, Sun's CEO, Scott McNealy, recently crowed that ''Windows is dead'' when it comes to new software applications, Mr. McNealy may be right. Despite Judge Jackson's snapshot view of the software market, the Internet has profoundly and permanently altered the dynamics. Will Microsoft lose out to consumer electronics products? Mr. McNealy doesn't know, and neither does Judge Jackson. But those products are out there, they're selling well, and they are competition.

What about Web-based software—probably the most formidable threat to Microsoft's dominance? Instead of buying and selling applications like word processors and speadsheets, users can rent the same functions from Internet services—or get them free if they sit through advertising.

The only essential user program is a Web browser. As the Wall Street Journal put it: ''If users don't need PCs with Microsoft's Windows operating system or Intel chips—the vaunted market power of the duo called Wintel doesn't seem so unshakable.''

The important points is this: Many desktop machines that access Web-based servers are ''Windows-less'' products, and Microsoft's major OEM customers are climbing on the band wagon. Gateway is building a line with no Microsoft software at all, and may jointly market it with AOL, which is a major Gateway investor. Dellalso plans to bring out a line of Internet computers, some without Microsoft software. Compaq's chief executive observes that its new generation of products will ''redefine Internet access.''

Another industry executive stated that ''the Internet gives people a platform to do most of the things they need to do on a PC without a cumbersome and expensive operating system.''

Judge Jackson, infinitely wiser about such matters now that he knows how to use his computer, has an astonishing two fold response to the emergence of Web-based servers. First, he contends that ''Windows has retarded, and perhaps altogether extinguished'' the server threat. That contention has a surreal quality: Judge Jackson describes an event that never actually happened but, if it had happened, it would have crippled competition. The same dialetic creeps into his anecdotal chronicle of Microsoft's persecution of Intel, Apple, and Compaq, as well as Microsoft's supposed market-splitting with Netscape. ''OK, so this thing Microsoft tried to do never did materialize. The other guy never agreed to it and ultimately he did what he wanted. But what a hobbling impact on innovation if things had gone otherwise.'' Judge Jackson's second justification for discounting Web-based servers is even stranger. He claims that viable competition from server-based applications ''is not imminent for at least the next few years.'' His projection is surely too conservative.

Venture capitalists report that they haven't seen a business plan for conventional packaged software in more than six months. Mr. McNealy predicts that fewer than 50 percent of the devices accessing the Internet will be Windows-equipped PCs by the year 2002, just a little over two years from now. Mr. McNealy has put Sun Micro systems' money where his mouth is—acquiring Star Division so he can convert its Star Office product into a free, Internet-based service that can be run directly by any user with any Web browser.

But more important, Judge Jackson's ''not imminent for a few years'' forecast has to be placed in context. He plans on issuing his conclusions of law in this case early next year. Then a hearing on remedies in the spring, with a possible summer decision. Then we can expect a year or so before the United States Court of Appeals finishes its review. Then another year for the Supreme Court's deliberations. Finally, even if Microsoft loses at each stage and remedies are imposed, they will not be effective overnight. In other words, the market will certainly have obviated any remedies before they can have an impact.

Meanwhile, Microsoft behaves not like a monopolist but like a company whose every survival is at stake. Its prices are down and its technology is struggling to keep pace with an explosion of fresh software products. Facing competition from new operating systems, consumer electronics, and Webbasedservers, Microsoft now operates in a world where anyone running a browser will soon have the same capabilities as today's Window users. That is why the government should keep it's hands off.

Mr. CRAIG. Mr. President, one editorial is by Robert Levy, a senior fellow of constitutional studies at the CATO Institute. He starts his op-ed piece:

Here's the lesson that high-tech companies can glean from Judge Thomas Penfield Jackson's findings in the Microsoft case: If you're sufficiently ambitious, competent, and hard-working; if you're willing to risk your time and fortune; if you succeed at rising above your competition by serving customers with better products; then watch out, because our government will come down on your neck with the force and effect of a guillotine.

The editorial in the Wall Street Journal probably sums it up best of all. There is no question my colleagues from the other side of the aisle—or should I say their political machinery as expressed by—I don't want to call them outbursts, but certainly the expressions of our Attorney General, Janet Reno, are best summed up when they discussed the Microsoft case this morning in the Wall Street Journal. Here is their concluding paragraph:

But let's get to the real bottom line. Washington's crusade against Microsoft has fulfilled its purpose, serving as a great lever to pry open the wallets of the Silicon Valley. Where three years ago the technological plutocrats spent their surplus income on racing yachts and Ferraris and charity, now they patriotically send donations to Washington to support the fixer class and its retinue in the style to which it would like to become accustomed.

Steve Case of AOL, who happens to be on the other side of this issue, recognizes the problem, though. He says the future of technology will be decided in the political arena rather than the marketplace. My guess is, if that is true, your computers will not be working as well tomorrow as they are working today.

I came to the floor this morning to join with my colleague from Wyoming, not to discuss the Microsoft case; that is going to get played out over time, and I think we are going to have a Federal judge who will try to run the technology business of this country. Maybe we need to decide to start a new agency of our Federal Government called U.S. Department of Microsoft. If it is as profitable as Microsoft, maybe we can make a lot more money without taxing the American public to allow our Democrat colleagues on the other side of the aisle to spend it.

Certainly Microsoft is now making as much as $1 billion a month in cash to spend. It is obvious somebody else wants their hands on that or wants to break up that very profitable business.

VIOLENCE IN AMERICA

Mr. CRAIG. Mr. President, what I came to the floor to talk about is a combination of issues that come together in the issue of violence. We watched the great tragedy as a fellow entered a workplace in Hawaii the week before last and killed some of his coworkers. Last week in Seattle, another man went into a business and shot and killed individuals. All of us, as Americans, are tremendously frustrated by this expression of violence or people seeming to want to solve their personal problems by acting in a very violent fashion. The Washington Post poll on Sunday showed that the No. 2 issue among Republicans was violence in the schools; the No. 4 issue among Democrats, violence in the schools; the No. 2 issue among Independents in America was violence, violence in the schools.

Our President last week suggested we live in a very violent society, when in fact violence is down substantially in our country. It is true that it is. We have come off a very violent year, but over the last 7 years the average rate of acts of violence is dropping, in the broad sense. Yet we have had some of these tremendously public-attention-gathering events that caused the American public to be concerned, as they are.

Of course, the issue I want to speak briefly about this morning is the question of how we fix this violent expression in our society. Last week, the President, Janet Reno, and AL GORE said there is a quick and easy way to fix it: We just need to pass a few more laws; gun laws, that is. We need to add to the 25,000 to 30,000 gun laws that are already on the books. If we do that, we will make America a safer place in which to live. Or at least we will say, politically, to meet the polls the Washington Post presented to us on Sunday, that if we pass the laws, the public at least will think America is a safer place in which to live. By that, we will be able to curry their political favor in the next election.

If gun laws make America a safer place, then what happened in Hawaii should not have happened; what happened in Seattle should not have happened; what happened in Littleton, CO, at Columbine High School, should not have happened—because there are laws to stop that. Mr. President, 13 laws were violated, tragically, by those two young men who later took their lives at Columbine High School in Littleton, CO, after they had killed so many of their classmates. But there was a law to stop them. Then why did it happen?

I do not know the answer to why it happened. I do know they broke a lot of laws to cause it to happen. Yet our President last week, and the Vice President, and the Attorney General said give us more laws and the world will be a safer place. We have all been on this floor discussing, for well over a year, our frustrations with problems with our culture, problems with our public schools. People are acting out their frustrations in violent ways by taking other people's lives. My guess is, you cannot legislate a fix on that one.

There are other problems within our society that have to be addressed. So let me focus for just a moment on Hawaii. There, we all know what happened. The fellow has been caught. We all know now he probably, during that act, was mentally incompetent, mentally in trouble, mentally deranged. But his actions cost lives.

His actions happened in a unique environment, though. Hawaii has more gun laws, to control gun ownership and gun usage, than any other State in the United States. So would logic not follow, at least the logic of the President and the Vice President and the Attorney General, if that were so, Hawaii should have been a terribly safe place? Hawaii is the only State in the Nation where you not only register every gun you have with the local and State authorities, you also register the bullets—you register the ammunition. Somehow, politicians in the State legislature in Hawaii thought that would make Hawaii a safe place—the only State in the Nation.

It just so happens, Janet Reno and AL GORE and the President want us to do the same in this country. But it did not stop the individual who killed his colleagues in Hawaii.

How about a permit to purchase? Of course, that is exactly what some of our colleagues would want here. Hawaii requires a permit to purchase any kind of gun—not just one permit for multiple purchases but a permit for every purchase—and a full background check, and the requirement that you must be at least 21 years of age to own a gun.

What about assault pistols and Saturday night specials and all those kinds of buzzwords about guns that have become villains here on the floor for political purposes? All of those are outlawed in Hawaii. It is against the law to own them. It is against the law to have them. All of that is the law in Hawaii. The man who did the killings in Hawaii had met all of the requirements of the law. Yet the law did not protect the citizens whose families now mourn their death.

How about high-capacity magazines? That was a fully debated issue here on the floor of the Senate this past year. I was on the floor with Senator HATCH and Senator LAUTENBERG on that issue after Littleton. It is against the law in Hawaii.

Then there are the restrictions on places of possession, where you simply cannot have a gun: A business; you can't travel with one, only in the owner's home and in very restricted places; or if you are traveling from the home to the firing range or the pistol range for target practice, you may have a gun on your person. Those are tough laws in Hawaii. Yet people are dead. Of course, I mentioned transportation and the restriction on transportation. All of those are parts of the laws that guard citizens against the violent acts of others with the use of a firearm in the State of Hawaii.

The President, the Vice President, and the Attorney General seem not to understand that or, if they do, they arefinding another reason to express a need for greater gun control in this country. I am not sure what that need is. We all know our citizens are concerned about violence.

We all know we have citizens in our country who act out their frustrations in violent ways. It is tragic that we believe we can simply turn to Congress that will pass a law and, therefore, the violence will go away.

Are the President and the Vice President and the Attorney General trying to hide something? Are they trying to hide the fact that during the Clinton administration arrests and prosecutions of citizens who violate Federal firearms laws has dropped by over 70 percent?

Is the President trying to mask the fact that the Puerto Rican terrorists to whom he offered clemency were violators of Federal firearms laws and they killed American citizens?

Is this President, once again, trying to throw up a political smokescreen by simply saying we need more laws against the use of guns or the ownership of guns or the second amendment rights when he, the President, in my opinion, has violated the intent of the laws as they now stand? If you do not use the law, if you do not prosecute under the law, if you do not enforce the law, then the laws are no good.

That is the message I send to Bill Clinton today: Mr. Clinton, look at your own record. Your own Attorney General has let it be known to U.S. attorneys around the country that it is not worth their time to go after violators of Federal firearms laws.

There is a great program down in Richmond, VA, where a Federal prosecutor said to the local police: You arrest them and I will throw them away, I will put them behind bars if they use a gun in the commission of a crime. Crime dropped precipitously but, more important, crimes with a gun involved dropped dramatically. One fellow was arrested at a 7–Eleven with a stick, and after he was arrested, the local police said: Why are you robbing a 7–Eleven with a stick?

He said: Because if I used a firearm, they will lock me up down here.

Mr. President, Bill Clinton, don't you get the message now? We have plenty of laws on the books if we had an Attorney General who was a real cop, a supercop, a tough person who was saying to her U.S. attorneys: Let's put them behind bars if they use guns; let's throw those kids out of school who take a gun to school. They do not have the right to be in our schools if they are putting the rest of our kids in jeopardy.

Last year that happened over 3,000 times and only 13 were prosecuted. Sorry, Mr. President, sorry, Mr. Vice President, sorry, Ms. Attorney General, passing laws does not a safer world make. Enforcing the ones we have, being concerned about the culture, being concerned about the kids, their parents, and their educators in a way that not only makes a safe school but makes a concerned citizen is going to drop violence in America. Do not give the American public a political placebo by simply passing another law.

I thank my colleague from Wyoming, and I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I thank my friend from Idaho. Certainly, this is one of the issues that is contentious and will, I suppose, be debated some more. I agree with the notion we need to do something more than passing more laws. It has no evidence of success.

INTERIOR APPROPRIATIONS BILL

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, one of the bills currently being considered, and is very important to the West particularly, is the Interior funding bill, the bill that funds the Interior Department, national parks, the Bureau of Land Management, Fish and Wildlife Service, and others. It is relatively small compared to others. It is around $13 billion, $14 billion. I never thought I would suggest that is small, but compared to $360 billion it is relatively small.

It has been tied up for a number of reasons. It has to do with the so-called land legacy the administration has been pushing recently, the idea of purchasing a great amount of land that has something to do with S. 25 that will bring in dollars from the Outer Continental Shelf royalties to be used in this area.

The controversy is over the purchase of additional lands. There are some good things about S. 25—taking some more money from oil royalties and using them for parks. I am chairman of the Parks Subcommittee, and I met this morning with the new advisory committee that will be focusing on concessions. The parks are more and more in demand, more and more people are coming to them, and more and more people are taking advantage of the parks, one of the legacies of this country. We are having problems with the upkeep of the infrastructure that must be done to preserve historic and natural values. I support that.

The park system, of course, has to be part of another section of parks, and that is local and State parks. National parks are not designed to provide all the services that people need. In communities, these are local responsibilities. Ball parks, for example, are put in by State and local parks. So they, too, need additional funding.

One of the interesting areas, particularly those in the West where they do a great deal of wild game hunting, is a thing called teaming for wildlife. In our State, for example, the funds that go to the game and fish department come from the purchase of licenses for game animals. They spend a great deal of their time dealing with animals that are not game animals that are threatened, endangered.

The problem, however, is the administration insists on having $1 billion a year to spend as they choose to buy land. This week, we had a hearing on the Forest Service setting aside 40 million acres by fiat, by administrative decree, to be used for de facto wilderness, if they choose, when under the law clearly to set aside land of that kind is the responsibility of the Congress.

We are having increasing difficulty with that. I do not know whether it is driven by the President's desire to have a legacy, to be a latter century Theodore Roosevelt, or whether it is the environmental aspect of the Gore campaign. The fact is, the White House is not a monarchy; it does not decide to do these things individually. There has to be a cooperative arrangement with the Congress, whether it is purchasing or whether it is assigning different designations to land. That is the way it is, and it needs to be preserved in that fashion, in my judgment.

We need to move forward with the Interior bill. It is one of about three bills that remains out of the 13, which is kind of surprising because it is one upon which most people here agree. There are a couple of things in it that are being used which I think are not realistic. One has to do with permits for grazing on Forest Service lands. Ranchers in the West—they have their base lands, of course—use grazing so we can have multiple use of public lands and forests, have grazing leases. In order to renew those leases, there needs to be a study. No one argues with the idea there needs to be a study. Unfortunately, they have not been able to keep up with the number of studies that need to be made, and so the study is not made before the permit expires and the Federal Government says: That's too bad, you're out of luck; take your cows and go home—when it has nothing to do with the permittee having not gotten the job done.

What this amendment to the Interior bill says is the permit will be renewed for a period of time until this study can be made. If the study is made and there have to be changes, then there can be changes. That is held up somehow by the White House, and they are making a big thing and separating that out.

The other is on oil royalties. We worked a long time trying to get fairness in oil royalties, taking out some of the charges and costs before the Government takes over, and percentage of royalties. We have not come to an agreement. This simply says, let's set it aside until the Congress and the executive department can come together. Again, not a willingness to work in a team fashion.

I am hopeful we can get by those kinds of things this week. We are aiming to get out of here in 3 days, in fact. The fact is, it is possible.

There are really only about three bills that need to be determined. Everyone knows what changes need to befocused on, what kind of concessions need to be made on both sides to make this happen. Usually, as we come down to the end, it is amazing how quickly some things can be done as opposed to when they just stretch out in the future.

So our goals are to have no Government shutdown—certainly that is the Republican position for the rest of this year—we are settled on not having any new taxes to finance this year's new programs—we certainly have an adequate amount of money—and we are committed to paying down the publicly held debt and to protecting the Social Security surplus. These are the kinds of things I think everyone can agree upon if we can get to it this time.

Mr. President, I yield the floor and suggest the absence of a quorum.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. REID. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. THOMAS). Without objection, it is so ordered.

TERRORISM AND ABORTION

Mr. REID. Mr. President, last Thursday, I was reading the morning newspaper in Washington when I came across an article describing for, lack of a better description, the emotional stress of a doctor, Steven Dixon. Dr. Dixon, after a lifetime of study and sacrifice, indicated he was going to give up the practice of medicine. Why? Because terrorists had broken his 40-year-old spirit. This 40-year-old doctor decided he wasn't going to practice medicine anymore. His will to work had been broken.

Dr. Dixon maintained a medical practice in the downtown DC area. Dr. Dixon, by training, was certified to be an obstetrician/gynecologist. In his practice, he helped women with a multitude of medical problems—basic checkups, physicals, and problems unique to women. On occasion, he terminated pregnancies. What did these people do to run Dr. Dixon out of the practice of medicine? They distributed wanted posters with his name and photograph like those you see in the post office. He received numerous threatening phone calls to his home and his office. Various threatening mail was sent to his home and office. These are some of the things that happened to Dr. Dixon.

In the United States, the highest court in the land, the U.S. Supreme Court, the same court that established the way commerce is conducted between the 50 States, the same court that decreed education cannot be separate and be equal, the same court that set precedence for the cleansing of Government by its overview of Watergate—this same U.S. Supreme Court has set forth a standard as to how abortion in the United States is legal. That is the final word, what the Supreme Court says in our country. Whether one agrees or disagrees, it is the law of this Republic.

But some are unwilling to follow the law of the land. They think they know better. This has led to violence, vandalism, brutal protests at legal clinics established to deal with a multitude of female-related health problems. In the last 20 years, there has been an average of 40 of these acts each week—bombings, arsons, death threats, kidnappings, murders, tires slashed, oil drained from cars, sugar put in gas tanks, blood splattered on people's homes and sidewalks and places of business. There have been 38,000 acts during less than two decades—38,000 acts of terrorism.

I am going to talk now about some examples of these terrorist acts. For example, people who work in entities, such as Planned Parenthood clinics, face acts of violence, threats, intimidation. In 1998, at just such clinics, there were multiple murders, bombings, and arsons, a score of butyric acid attacks. That is a chemical compound that burns and leaves an awful smell. Anti-choice violence and terrorism is worsening. It should be stopped. Dr. Dixon, who I have never met, who many read about last Thursday, which caused me to begin thinking about this issue, stated in a letter:

> It is ironic that I am a target, because my entire career has been about educating and empowering women to help prevent unintended pregnancies. While I have always supported a woman's right to have this legal procedure, I actually performed few abortions for my patients. In fact, I stopped performing them because of the stress associated with this terrorism. Sadly, the ongoing threat to my life and my concern for the safety of my loved ones has exacted a heavy toll on me, making it necessary that I discontinue practicing.

I don't know Dr. Dixon, never met him, never talked to him. But those who threaten Dr. Dixon are cowards, terrorists, no different than the people who blew up the New York City Trade Center. They are murderers. These killers and would-be killers and terrorists call each other patriots. The true patriots of this Nation are those who have given their all in the fields of battle, places called the Bulge and the beaches of Guadalcanal, Pork Chop Hill in Korea, and in Vietnam. And many people who haven't given their lives have sacrificed a great deal. Many serve in this Chamber. Under our system of government, which has been in existence for more than 200 years, the law of the land can only be changed by peaceful political means, through persuasion, debate, demonstrations that are peaceful in nature, grassroots political activity, the assertion of one's feelings at the ballot box, but never, never, through violence and intimidation. What is now taking place in our country by these zealots is despicable.

Why do I say what I have said? Why do I conclude this? Let me travel a little bit. Remember, we have 38,000 of these terrorist acts, and I am going to talk about a few of these demonstrations of viciousness. A manual has been produced by a group called the Army of God. It is a manual directing there to be no trial, no jury, no appeal, no stay of execution. Their clear declaration is to kill abortion doctors and people associated with abortion clinics—kill whoever they decide should be murdered.

Doctor Barnett Slepian. I didn't realize this until after the murder had taken place, but Dr. Slepian's niece worked for me here in Washington. She is now a writer of some acclaim. She had an article published in the last issue of George magazine. She is from Reno, NV, and is a wonderful young lady. Dr. Barnett Slepian was shot and killed by a bullet that came through his kitchen window at the same time the doctor was having dinner with his family in his kitchen. After this brutal murder, this cowardly act, his death was mocked publicly. His murder was commended by some groups. The killer, even though identified, has not been apprehended.

In Birmingham, AL, at a health clinic, there was a bomb blast which killed the security guard who was there, a man by the name of Robert Sanderson. He was a police officer trying to make some money on the side. Emily Lyons, a nurse, was severely injured and left nearly blind and with medical bills of almost $1 million. Eric Robert Rudolph has been charged with this attack. He is the man who is being chased through the hills in the south, someplace in North Carolina. He is one of the FBI's Ten Most Wanted. He is yet to be found.

In December of 1996, Dr. Calvin Jackson was stabbed many, many times. He lost at least four pints of blood, and one ear was severed. His assailant was apprehended a few hours later, after entering another clinic carrying a filleting knife.

John Salvi—at about the same time this Jackson matter took place—was tried for two murders of clinic receptionists, people who were secretaries—Shannon Lowney and Lee Ann Nichols. He attempted to kill five others. He fired bullets into these clinics in Brookline, MA, and Norfolk, VA.

It is hard for me to say this, but a Reverend, Rev. Paul Hill, a well-known protester and director of the anti-choice group called Defensive Action, was convicted in the fall of 1994 for the murders of Dr. John Britton and a 74-year-old man who happened to be with him outside a health clinic in Pensacola, FL.

The two victims were shot with a 12-gauge shotgun. Before the shootings, Reverend Hill had been previously arrested for his activities where he advocated continual use of force.

Dr. David Gunn, a physician, was murdered during a protest at a Pensacola clinic. Wanted posters featuring Dr. Gunn's photograph, telephone number, and schedule were distributed at an Operation Rescue rally in Montgomery, AL, and other places.

Dr. George Tiller, who was a target of violence and blockades for many years, was shot in both arms.

Finally, in Wichita, KS, a person charged with a shooting who had been arrested on previous occasions for trespassing and blockading clinic entrances praised the man who murdered Dr. Gunn.

I was the first person to come here and speak out on the Senate floor about Dr. Gunn's murder, which I thought was sickening.

Neal Horsley, a militant and founder of a group called the Creator's Rights Party, has developed a web site entitled ''The Nuremberg Files.'' The site was designed to ''collect evidence.'' This so-called ''evidence'' lists clinic staff members, law enforcement officers, judges, and politicians for use in future trials ''for their crimes.'' Remember that they work in legal clinics. The site seeks and lists personal information such as photos of them and their families, their houses, their cars, their driving records, license plate numbers, names and birth dates of individuals, and even the birth dates of their family.

A legend accompanies this list of names under a banner where there is a simulation of dripping blood. The legend indicates the degree that this so-called Creator's Rights Party wants to place these people. There is a black font for people who just work there. Then it becomes gray when somebody has been wounded. Their name isn't completely stricken but partially stricken when they have been wounded by one of these terrorists. But if someone is killed, like Dr. Slepian, there is an immediate strike through. They are stricken off the list.

Last year, about a year ago, at a Planned Parenthood clinic in Milwaukee there was an envelope received in the mail. Inside the envelope was a bomb constructed of two batteries with wire wrapped in modeling clay. These bombs didn't work. But the message written on white paper stated that the next one might be real. The next day, Milwaukee's Affiliated Medical Services received a similar mailing.

A week after the murder of Dr. Slepian, four clinics in three States received letters purporting to contain anthrax, which we know is the most deadly strain of bacteria. A few days later, six more anthrax threats were sent to clinics. Although some clinics were closed and staff decontaminated, all of these threats turned out to be hoaxes.

Bombs were discovered at two clinics in North Carolina about a year ago, less than a month after these clinics had been damaged by arson.

Between May and July of last year, 19 clinics in Louisiana, Florida, and Texas were vandalized with butyric acid, that I have already talked about, which is a noxious industrial chemical which sent people who happened to be in the area to hospitals, including patients and staff members. They went there with respiratory problems, nausea, and sickness. Clinics were closed for days while they tried to get the smell out of their facilities.

Shortly after the clinic bombings in Atlanta and Oklahoma, an Oregon physician, Peter Bours, received a letter which demanded $50,000 in cash and threatened, ''The bombings in Atlanta and Oklahoma are a warning,'' and indicated that those who do not comply to our demands will be destroyed.

The FBI arrested a man by the name of William Kitchens. When they arrested him, they discovered a book in his kitchen on extortion and kidnapping.

Within 2 weeks of Dr. Britton's murder in Pensacola, FL, the last remaining doctor then providing advice in Mississippi, Dr. Joseph Booker became the target of a ''No Place to Hide'' campaign. The campaign's leader, Roy McMillan, signed a petition advocating the murder of Dr. Britton and others.

According to physician Pablo Rodriguez, ''[i]n the beginning, the harassment consisted of just nasty letters and graphic pictures. Then I began receiving strange packages with dolls inside, as well as subscriptions to gun magazines. . . . Then the ''Wanted'' posters with my picture on them began to appear. . . . Then the doors and locks to our clinic were glued several times, and protesters blockaded the clinic three times. . . . Just after Dr. Gunn's death, . . . I realized that my car was steering poorly. I checked my tires and found 45 nails embedded in them. . . . That evening, my wife painfully discovered with her foot that our driveway had been booby-trapped with roofing nails cleverly buried beneath the snow. . . . My home, my haven of safety—violated.''

Shortly after Operation Rescue targeted physician Frank Snydle as part of its ''No Place to Hide'' campaign, his 80-year-old mother received a telephone call that was false and misleading and a prank at 3 a.m. in the morning telling her that her son had been killed in a car accident.

A Dallas physician by the name of Norman Tompkins and his wife received hundreds of phone calls and pieces of hate mail. The message, for example, left on Dr. Tompkins' answering machine stated, ''I'm going to cut your wife's liver out and make you eat it. Then I'm going to cut your head off.'' Protesters with bullhorns repeatedly demonstrated at Dr. Tompkins' home early on Saturday mornings. On several occasions, he has had to have a police escort to go to church.

A 14-page ''joke'' booklet—it certainly is anything but a joke—was distributed by an anti-choice group called ''Life Dynamics'' to more than 33,000 medical students. These so-called ''jokes'' recommended physicians who perform abortions should be shot, attacked by dogs, and buried in concrete. One medical student who received the booklet the same day Dr. Gunn was murdered stated, ''To say the least, it was upsetting''—that all OB/GYNs should be killed.

The extraordinary measures that people must take for their protection doesn't seem right in a country such as ours. But physicians and other clinic workers face the daily possibility of terrorism and violence in order to provide women with legal reproductive health services.

In the wake of the recent killings and harassment of people at their homes, providers are resorting to extraordinary new measures to protect themselves. Clinics are spending hundreds of thousands of dollars in bulletproof glass, armed guards, security cameras, metal detectors and other security devices. Doctors are wearing bullet-proof vests and some have even purchased armored vehicles to go to work.

Clinic workers have been instructed by Federal marshals to vary their routes to go to work—clinic workers, secretaries, nurses, phone operators, janitors—to drive to a safe haven if followed, and to call police if they receive a suspicious package, as it would likely contain a bomb.

In Boston, MA, Dr. Maureen Paul no longer sits on the third floor atrium she built for herself as a so-called ''dream spot.'' In light of Dr. Slepian's murder in his home, she feels too vulnerable there, which, according to Dr. Paul ''really makes me angry because, wow, this is the space I created for me. I don't get to be home very often, and so it really disturbs me that I have to think about getting shot in a place I love.''

Many other clinic directors, including Director Warren Hern, installed bullet-proof glass in his office and hired private armed security guards. He wears a bullet-proof vest at his public appearances. Stated Dr. Hern:

> I walk out of my office and the first thing I do is look at the parking garage the hospital built two doors away to see if there is a sniper on the roof. I expect to be shot any day, any minute. I'm in a war zone. It is frightening and it has ruined my life.

These are only a few of the 38,000 acts of intimidation that have taken place in America.

For example, Dr. Slepian was murdered. Keep in mind, his murder occurred while he was having dinner with his family in his kitchen. Somebody with a high-powered rifle shot him through his kitchen window with one bullet through the head in front of his entire family. After the killing took place, a poem appeared on the Internet, ''Ode to Slepian.'' They say the most vicious things. They have the audacity to quote Holy Scripture to condone their act of violence and their attempt to ''coronate'' this act of violence as something good and positive.

> ''The sound of window glass shattering, a hollow thud, and a woman's scream coming from within the house, pierced the frigid air. He smiled. Hallelujah to the Lord.''

This has got to stop.

Six years ago, I was first to speak out against clinic violence. On the day Dr. Gunn was brutally murdered in Florida, I said I thought that was wrong. I still think it is wrong. Regardless of a person's feeling on the issue of abortion, we can't allow this to takeplace. After the speeches on clinic violence and the public's disgust, a law was passed - Federal Access to Clinic Entrance Act. It was directed toward this terrorism at clinics. It has helped. Not a great deal, but it has helped. It is a step in the right direction.

Today, I am directing a letter to the Attorney General of the United States, Janet Reno. I say to Janet Reno, I know there is a task force dealing with these issues, but we in Congress need to be told what is being done. We need to see some results and we need to know what more can be done. We need a report.

We not only have to go after those people who have committed these atrocious deadly acts, but we need to figure out a program to stop them from happening in the first place. We can't have the Internet, the U.S. mail, people's homes and businesses violated by these terrorists.

I am asking Janet Reno to give us in Congress some direction, some guidance as the chief law enforcement officer in this country. We want to know what you are doing to stop these acts of intimidation and violence. It is time these 38,000 acts are stopped. We must do something to stop this senseless violence in the land of our liberty.

We must understand that what separates any pluralistic society from anarchy is a recognition that no one has a monopoly on the truth. When this basic precept fails, so does the community. It was thus in Kosovo, Bosnia, and Rwanda, in the Germany of the 1930s and America of 1861.

There have always been people who knew the wishes of their Supreme Being more clearly than others. Some became St. Francis; others burned St. Joan. Some raised cathedrals; others sacked Jerusalem. Some wrote hymns of praise to the Lord; others wrote his name in blood. There have always been people who knew their law was of a higher moral value than the laws of society in which they live.

Some became Gandhi and led marches to the sea; others became Theodore Kaczynski and mailed bombs to people they never met. Some became Henry David Thoreau and refused to make war; others became Timothy McVeigh and made war on innocent men, women, and children. Some became Martin Luther King and marched to Selma; others became James Earl Ray, the lone fanatic with a gun.

As long as any man or woman combines that mistaken belief in a higher law with a conviction that they are empowered to enforce it against their fellow man, so long will the fringe fanatics of the pro-life movement, murder and maim and intimidate in violation of the rights and beliefs of every person dedicated to a just and civil society in America.

All Americans must speak out against this new American terror; to do otherwise is un-American.

Mr. DORGAN. Mr. President, Senator CRAIG from Idaho and I, following the Senator from Montana speaking, intend to have perhaps 15 minutes split between the two of us. I ask unanimous consent we be recognized following the presentation by the Senator from Montana.

Mr. REID. The Senator from Montana needs 10 minutes?

Mr. BAUCUS. I will need 10 to 12 minutes.

Mr. DORGAN. I ask unanimous consent following the presentation of the Senator from Montana I be recognized for 15 minutes with the intention of yielding some of that time to the Senator from Idaho.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nevada controls the time.

Mr. REID. I have no objection to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

JAPAN'S MARKET OPERATIONS

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, a long list of issues must be addressed in the next round of the multilateral trade negotiations that kick off in Seattle in 4 weeks. Agricultural trade is at the very top. Other issues include further reducing tariffs, repairing the WTO dispute settlement process, removing restrictions on trade and services, increasing opportunities to sell to governments, avoiding measures that restrict the growth of electronic commerce and figuring out how to put a human face on trade law consideration of the relationship between trade and labor and between trade and the environment.

There is another issue that has received virtually no attention at all. Yet it is of critical importance to the United States, to most other nations, and to the world trading system itself. I refer to the problem of Japan, the second largest economy in the world. A country where the markets for our goods and services remain far more closed than they should be.

The sense-of-the-Senate resolution I am introducing today, along with Senator GRASSLEY, urges the administration to pay much more attention to Japan in the next trade round than was the case in the past.

I want the administration to work overtime to ensure that Japan makes commitments that will genuinely open its markets. And the administration must then ensure that Japan meets those commitments. Paper agreements will not suffice. Agreeing to broad principles is unacceptable. Negotiations in the next trade round must lead to clear results in Japan. There must be meaningful, measurable change in the way Japan's markets operate.

Historically, the relationship between multilateral and bilateral trade commitments made by Japan, and then whether there is actual change in Japan's markets, has been tenuous, at best. The American Chamber of Commerce in Japan, in its report ''Making Trade Talks Work'', documented this problem of implementation and results.

In the Uruguay round, Japan did not have to make the kind of significant changes that were required of many other major trading countries. Including the United States. Even where Japan agreed to open its market, such as the rice market, the out-of-quota tariff rate is still in the range of 500 percent. That is not a misquote. It is Five Zero Zero, 500 percent tariff on rice coming into Japan from the United States. I am worried that in the next round, the Japanese Government will be able to minimize the commitments they make. And then, in a uniquely Japanese way, they will be able to minimize the implementation of those commitments and obligations. In earlier trade rounds, Japan agreed to the GATT Government Procurement Code. But the United States found that we had to negotiate special bilateral agreements with Japan in order to get genuine access to their government market. We negotiated multiple arrangements on computers, supercomputers, telecommunications equipment, medical equipment, and satellites. Even with these arrangements, access to Japan's market has still been a major problem in many of these areas. The GATT system has not worked well here. In the Uruguay round, we were so focused on other problems, especially in Europe, that we missed a lot of opportunities with Japan. I am concerned that the same thing may happen again. I certainly do not want to take away from the focus on agriculture and other priorities we have for the next round. But I want to be sure that we do not let Japan off again.

Japan seems now to be working overtime to protect its trade-distorting policies in agriculture, forestry, and fishing. The Advanced Tariff Liberalization efforts would have been further along but for Japanese opposition at APEC. Now, Japan is trying to hide its protectionist policies behind the banner of the ''multifunctionality'' of agriculture. That is, they claim that farming plays an important role in a country's social and cultural fabric, trade liberalization cannot interfere. Of course, farming is integral to the social fabric of many nations, including our own. But that is not an excuse for trade protection and making other countries pay those domestic social costs.

At the same time, Japan is playing a leading role in criticizing United States trade laws and in working with other countries to challenge our antidumping and countervailing duty laws in the next round. Some speculate that this is just another attempt to undercut American initiatives in the new round. Japan could, and more important Japan should, take a leadership role in a number of areas. After all, few countries in the world have benefited more than Japan over the past half century from an open world trading system.

Japan could take significant steps to make its regulatory system more transparent and less burdensome. They could table a broad based services liberalization proposal that would encourage others to follow. Japan could lead the effort to put more transparency into the government procurement agreement. It could lead on electronic commerce. And, of course, it could deal with those agriculture policies that are at the top of the agenda.

This resolution calls on the administration to focus on Japan in the next round, to set out specific expectations for the changes desired in Japan, to ensure that Japanese commitments made in the round will truly lead to change in the Japanese market, to work with other major nations to ensure that these changes occur, and to consult closely with Congress and the private sector, including manufacturers, agriculture, service providers, and NGOs, throughout the negotiations.

I hope my colleagues will join me in helping ensure full participation by Japan in the round and in ensuring that we will benefit from Japan's commitments.

I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota.

Under the previous order, the Senator from North Dakota is recognized for 15 minutes.

THE UPCOMING WTO TRADE SUMMIT

Mr. DORGAN. Mr. President, I am pleased to come to the floor today along with my colleague from Idaho, Senator CRAIG, to discuss objectives we have for the upcoming WTO trade summit in Seattle, WA. We want that trade summit, the initiation of a new round of trade talks, to be as productive as possible for this country and especially for this country's family farmers and ranchers.

In recent years, we have seen the results of our trade negotiators negotiating trade agreements in secret around the globe and developing the conditions under which we trade goods and services. Family farmers and ranchers largely have discovered they have been given short shrift and not treated very well. In fact, their remedies to attempt to confront unfair trade arrangements were taken away. They discovered that in many cases the competition they face in the marketplace for agricultural goods was unfair competition. They discovered foreign markets were still closed to them, with little promise of them being opened.

We decide this time that the round of trade talks that will begin with the WTO in Seattle would be different. So Senator CRAIG and I convened a caucus, the WTO Trade Caucus for Farmers and Ranchers. We called our colleagues in the House, Congressman Simpson and Congressman Pomeroy, and, with the four of us as cochairs, created an organization in Congress that has nearly 50 Senators and Congressmen, to try to establish, a set of objectives that will be helpful to family farm interests in this country for our trade ambassador and our trade negotiators to follow.

Mind you, we are not simply focusing on the issue of family farmers. We want our trade talks to be fruitful to our country and our economy as a whole. But we believe very strongly, representing rural States, that family farmers have been hurt by recent trade agreements and that ought not be the case. Trade arrangements and trade negotiations ought to help our producers, not hurt them. So our caucus—again, nearly 50 Senators and Congressmen strong—Republicans and Democrats working together, established a set of objectives. Those objectives we have used in meetings with the trade ambassador and with the Secretary of Agriculture and others, and many of us will in fact go to Seattle the first week of December and be present at the initiation of these trade talks, trying to press the case that this time family farmers and ranchers across this country must not be given short shrift in the trade talks.

I would like to go through a couple of charts that describe the seriousness of the situation we want to confront with this trade agenda. Here is a chart that shows what has happened to our trade deficit. We are beginning a new round of trade talks at a time our trade deficit is going through the roof, $25 billion in a month in trade deficits. That is very serious. That is the highest trade deficit anywhere in history, by any country, any place, any time.

What is happening with imports and exports? This chart shows that imports keep going up, up, and up, while exports are basically a flat line. That is, of course, what is causing our trade imbalance.

Just on agricultural trade alone, in the last couple of years, we have had a very healthy surplus in agricultural trade that has shrunk, and shrunk, and shrunk some more. This is a chart that spells out the difficulties family farmers now face—the rather anemic ability to export to other countries. We are not exporting as much as we used to, and there is a substantial amount of increased imports in food products from abroad.

Finally, let me take it from the general to the specific, to say one of the burrs under my saddle has always been the trade with Canada. It is fundamentally unfair. This chart shows what has happened with our agricultural trade balance with Canada. The United States-Canadian trade agreement and NAFTA turned a healthy trade surplus with Canada in agricultural commodities alone into a very sizable deficit. That is the wrong direction. In durum wheat, in the first 7 months of this year compared with the first 7 months of previous years, which themselves are an all-time record, you will see once again we continue a massive quantity of unfair trade coming in from Canada.

I simply tell my colleagues this to explain that we have serious challenges in this trade round. The caucus that we have established created some objectives on behalf of farmers and ranchers, under the heading of Fair trade for agriculture at the WTO conference:

Expand market access. Too many markets around the world are closed to American farmers and ranchers who want to compete. Expand access, eliminate export subsidies. Those are trade-distorting.

The fact is, we are barraged with export subsidies in multiples of what we are able to do. We ought to eliminate export subsidies—the Europeans, especially, are guilty of massive quantities of export subsidies.

Discipline state trading enterprises. These are sanctioned monopolies that would not be legal in our country. The Canadian Wheat Board, especially, engages in unfair trade.

Improve market access for products of new biotechnology.

Deny unilateral disarmament; that is, do not give up the tools to combat unfair trade; and do not give up the domestic tools to support family farmers.

We have a substantial list on our agenda. Rather than go through all of this, I want to yield to the Senator from Idaho in a moment, but let me also say the Presiding Officer, the Senator from Wyoming, is also involved in this caucus, as are many others, Republicans and Democrats, working together for a common purpose, and that common purpose is to say: Farmers and ranchers around this country work hard, and they do their level best. They raise livestock and grain and they do a good job. They can compete anywhere, any time, under any condition, but they cannot compete successfully when the rules of trade are unfair.

That, sadly, too often has been the case, and we intend this time in this WTO round to see that is no longer the case. We want these negotiations to bear fruit—bear grain, actually, now that I think about it, from my part of the country, but fruit for others. We want these negotiations to work for our family farmers and ranchers.

Bipartisan work in Congress does not get very much attention because there is not much controversy attached to it, but there are many instances in which we work together across the aisle. This is one. A bipartisan group of 50 Members of the House and Senate are working together for a common objective: to improve conditions in rural America as a result of the upcoming WTO round of trade talks. I am very pleased to have been working with my colleague, Senator CRAIG, from the State of Idaho. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho.

Mr. CRAIG. Mr. President, I thank Senator DORGAN for outlining the intent of the effort underway by the Senator, myself, and 49 other colleagues. It was Senator BYRON DORGAN who approached me on the idea of creating aWTO caucus to elevate the interests of agriculture in this up-and-coming round of the WTO planning session in Seattle in December.

I thank him for that vision. It has been fun working with him as we have created what I think is—sometimes unique in the Congress—a bipartisan, bicameral effort where we are all standing together on a list of items and issues we know are key for American agriculture. The Senator has outlined those on which we came together in a consensus format that we think are critical, that we presented to our Trade ambassador and to our Secretary of Agriculture.

Market access—we know how critically important that is; export subsidies and how they are used or used against us; State trading enterprises and their ability to mask the reality of subsidies from products that enter the marketplace in a nontransparent way; nontariff barriers that are used to block the movement we want to see in certain trade efforts.

All of these are the issues we have presented and because of our effort collectively, we have caused the Secretary of Agriculture and the Trade ambassador to suggest that No. 1 on the agenda of America's negotiators at the WTO will be agricultural issues.

Why are we concerned about it? Here is an example. Even after the Uruguay agreement which required tariff reductions of some 36 percent, the average bound agricultural tariff of WTO members is still 50 percent. In contrast the average U.S. tariff on agricultural imports is less than 10 percent—50 percent versus 10 percent on the average. Those are the kinds of relationships we have to see brought into balance and corrected.

The United States spends less than 2 percent, $122 million a year, of what the European Union spends on export subsidies. They spend $7 billion a year, buying down the cost of their product to present it into a world market. In fact, the European Union accounts for 84 percent of the total agricultural export subsidy worldwide. Subsidized foreign competition has contributed to the nearly 20-percent decline in U.S. agricultural exports, as Senator DORGAN so clearly pointed out on his charts a few moments ago. That dramatic reduction in the agricultural trade surplus from a $27 billion surplus for us in 1996 to just $11.5 billion this year says it very clearly. We have to do something on behalf of American agriculture to allow them a much fairer access to world markets.

Those are the issues we think are so critical as we deal with our world traders in Seattle. Nontariff barriers have become the protectionist weapon of choice particularly for the products derived from new technologies, as Customs tariffs are lowered. U.S. negotiators should prevent our trading partners from making crops and other foods produced with genetically modified organisms into second-class food products. Yes, we have to do a better job of convincing the world of our tremendous scientific capability. At the same time, they cannot arbitrarily be used as a target for nontariff barriers, as will be argued or debated in Seattle.

That is a collection of many of the issues with which we are going to be dealing. It is so important America recognizes the abundance of its agriculture and the unique situation we find ourselves in a world market today where we have had the privilege, through the productivity of America's farmers, to lead the world. We now do not lead when it comes to agricultural exports but we will search to cause it to happen, through the openness of the marketplace, through the fairness of competition we know American agriculture, given that opportunity, can offer.

Again, I thank Senator DORGAN for his cooperativeness and the ability to work together with our colleagues MIKE SIMPSON and EARL POMEROY from the House and, as Senator DORGAN mentioned, the Senator from Wyoming who is presiding at this moment. All of these are tremendously important and critical issues for our home States and for America at large. The abundance, the productivity of American agriculture hangs in the balance. To the consumer who walks in front of a supermarket shelf every day to see such phenomenal abundance, that in itself could decline if we are not allowed the world marketplace in which to sell the goods and services of American agriculture.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD agricultural trade priorities for the WTO Conference.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WTO TRADE CAUCUS FOR FARMERS AND RANCHERS—AGRICULTURAL TRADE PRIORITIES FOR THE WTO MINISTERIAL CONFERENCE AND NEW ROUND OF GLOBAL TRADE NEGOTIATIONS

MARKET ACCESS

Expand market access through tariff reduction or elimination.

Negotiate zero-for-zero for appropriate sectors.

Strive for reciprocal market access.

Even after the Uruguay Round Agreement, which required tariff reductions of 36 percent, the average bound agriculture tariff of WTO members is still 50 percent. In contrast, the average U.S. tariff on agriculture imports is less than 10 percent.

EXPORT SUBSIDIES

Eliminate all export subsidies.

Reduce European Union (EU) subsidies to the level provided by the United States before applying any formula reduction. Negotiations must not leave the EU with an absolute subsidy advantage.

The United States spends less than 2 percent ($122 million) of what the EU spends on export subsidies ($7 billion). In fact, the EU accounts for 84 percent of total agriculture export subsidies worldwide. Subsidized foreign competition has contributed to the nearly 20 percent decline in U.S. agriculture exports over the last three years, and the dramatic reduction in the agriculture trade surplus, from $27 billion in 1996 to just $11.5 billion this year.

NO UNILATERAL DISARMAMENT

Combat Unfair Trade.

Restore and strengthen enforcement tools against unfair trade practices.

Improve enforcement of WTO dispute panel decisions, accelerate the process, and make it more transparent.

Support Family Farmers.

Preserve the flexibility to assist family farmers through income assistance, crop insurance and other programs that do not distort trade.

Retain the full complement of non-trade distorting export tools including export credit guarantees, international food assistance, and market development programs.

STATE TRADING ENTERPRISES

Establish disciplines on STEs to make them as transparent as the U.S. marketing system.

Expose STEs to greater competition from in-country importers and exporters.

Eliminate the discriminatory pricing practices of STE monopolies that amount to de facto export subsidies.

Export STEs like the Canadian Wheat Board and the Australian Wheat Board Ltd. control more than ⅓ of world wheat and wheat flour trade. Import STEs keep U.S. farmers and exporters out of lucrative foreign markets.

NON-TARIFF TRADE BARRIERS

Ensure that science and risk assessment principles established by the Sanitary and Phytosanitary Accord during the Uruguay Round are the basis of measures applied to products of new technology and that this process be transparent.

Assume that regulatory measures applied to products of new technologies do not constitute ''unnecessary regulatory burdens.''

Negotiate improved market access for products of new technology, including bioengineered products.

Non-tariff barriers have become the protectionist weapon of choice, particularly for the products derived from new technologies, as customs tariffs are lowered. U.S. negotiators should prevent our trading partners from making crops and other goods produced with genetically-modified organisms into second-class food products that are the subject of discrimination in foreign markets.

Mr. CRAIG. I yield the floor.

Mr. DORGAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to add 10 minutes to the discussion. I want to ask the Senator from Idaho a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DORGAN. Mr. President, I listened to the Senator from Idaho, and one of the points he made is important. A lot of people do not understand that following the conclusion of the latest round of trade talks, there remains a 50-percent tariff on average in other countries. To the extent we can get our agricultural commodities into those countries, there is a 50-percent tariff on those goods.

In previous speeches I talked about eating American T-bone steaks in Japan and that there is a 40.5-percent tariff on every pound of beef going into Japan. That is actually a bit lower than the average tariff that is confronting our products going elsewhere in the world.

I think anyone would conclude it is a failure if we had a 50-percent tariff onan agricultural commodity coming into this country, and yet our producers confront it all across the world. In fact, those are the cases when we can get products in. There are many circumstances where we will not get products into a market at all or, if we get some products in, we cannot get sufficient quantity; is that not correct?

Mr. CRAIG. The Senator is absolutely correct. When we came out of the Uruguay Round, when the round was heralded to have significant improvements in overall tariff levels, the problem was that most tariffs in the world were very high and ours were very low.

So we negotiated everybody down equally. We took a reduction in tariff. They, the European community, and others, took a reduction in tariff, which brought the average, other than the tariffs of the United States, down to 50 percent; and ours were down in the 10-percent-or-less range. So it was this kind of gradual slide.

I do not call that fair or balanced. It would have been different if the rest of the world had come down to a 20-percent-or-less range or properly on parity with the United States at 10 percent or less. That really is the way we should negotiate.

Thank goodness our Trade Representative, Charlene Barshefsky, agrees with us now and has agreed they will not negotiate from that position in Seattle, that clearly the European community and others have to bring that down to a near level area.

Mr. DORGAN. Mr. President, further inquiring, is it not the case that exactly the same thing happened on export subsidies? The Senator from Idaho described tariffs that exist in our country versus other countries and trade talks attempting to reduce those tariffs, except they left the tariffs much higher in other countries than in our country. If you go down 10 percent, and one country has a 50-percent tariff, that means you have taken their tariff down from 50 to 45 percent. If we have a 10-percent tariff, we go from 10 to 9. That does not make any sense to me.

Exactly the same thing was true with respect to export subsidies. So the European countries were left with export subsidies many times in excess of anything we could possibly use. That was probably fine in the first 25 years after the Second World War because then our trade policy was really foreign policy. We were trying to help other countries out of the trouble they were in. We could beat anybody else around the world in trade with one hand tied behind our back. It didn't matter very much. We could do a lot of concessional things.

That is not the case anymore. The European Union is a tough, shrewd economic competitor. Japan is a tough, shrewd economic competitor. The same is true of many of our trading partners. We must begin to insist that trade policy be hard-nosed economic policy, not foreign policy.

I inquire of the Senator from Idaho, is it not the case that the point we are making in these trade objectives is to say, on both market access—on tariffs, on export subsidies—and other items, that we do not want to be in a circumstance anymore when, at the end of the negotiation, we have made concessions to other countries that put our producers at a significant and distinct disadvantage?

Is it not the case that our producers, at the end of the previous rounds, were at a distinct and dramatic disadvantage, and our objective is to make sure that does not happen again.

Mr. CRAIG. The Senator is absolutely correct. In fact, let me give an example of the disadvantage we were in that caused great frustration.

The Senator's State and my State produce a variety of grains. And we produce them at high rates of yield. They are high-quality grains. Yet we found shiploads of grains, barley in some instances, from foreign countries sitting at our docks, being sold into our markets at below our production costs.

How did that come about? That came about because the government of the producing country that sent the boatload of grain to the Port of Portland subsidized it down to a level that they could actually enter our market and compete against our producers who were getting 1950 prices for their 1998 barley crop.

How do you pay for a brand new tractor or a brand new combine with 1950 dollars in 1998? You do not. You run the old combine, you fix it up, or you go bankrupt. But that is exactly what was happening because our negotiators did not do the effective job of bringing down export subsidies in a way that would disallow the greatest grain-producing country in the world to accept grain at its ports from foreign nations at below our cost of production. That is the best example I can give.

Mr. DORGAN. If the Senator would yield, I think the Senator is describing, at least in one case, a barley shipment coming from the European Union to Stockton, CA. It pulled up to the dock in Stockton, CA, and was able to offload barley shipped over here from Europe at a price that was dramatically below the price that was received in this country by barley growers, at a time, incidentally, when our barley price was in the tank.

How could that be the case? The reason they could do it is they deeply subsidized it. In fact, they dumped it into our marketplace. When that ship showed up at the California dock, it represented legal trade. Think of that: A deeply subsidized load of grain coming into a country that is awash in its own barley, with prices in the tank, and that ship shows up, and it is perfectly legal. They can just dump it into our marketplace. They can hurt our farmers. It doesn't matter because it is legal under the previous trade agreement.

That describes why our farmers and ranchers in this country are so upset. They have reason to be upset. They ought to be able to expect, when our negotiator negotiates with other countries, that we get a fair deal. It is not a fair deal to say to other countries: We will compete with you, but you go ahead and subsidize; drive down the price. Dump it, if you like, and there will be no remedy for family farmers to call it unfair trade because we in our trade agreement will say it is OK.

It is not OK with me. It is not OK with the Senator from Idaho. It is not OK with many Republicans and Democrats who serve in Congress who insist it is time to ask that trade be fair so our producers, when they confront competition from around the world, can meet that competition in a fair and honest way. That is not what is happening today.

If I might make one additional point, the Senator represents a State that borders with Canada, a good neighbor of ours to the north. My State borders with Canada. I like the Canadians. I think they are great people.

But following the trade agreement with Canada, and then NAFTA, we began to see this flood of Canadian durum coming into this country. It went from 0 to 20 million bushels a year. Why? Do we need durum in this country? No. We produce more than we need. Why are we flooded with durum? Because Canada has the state trading enterprise called the Canadian Wheat Board, which would be illegal in this country but legal there.

They sell into this country at secret prices. It is perfectly legal. You can sell at secret prices. You dump and hide behind your secrecy, and no one can penetrate it. That is why our farmers are angry. It has totally collapsed the price of durum wheat. It is unfair trade. All the remedies that farmers and ranchers would use to fight this unfair trade are gone.

Ranchers have just gotten together in something called R-CALF. They have spent a lot of money and legal fees and so on and taken action against the Canadians. Guess what. The first couple steps now they have won. But that should not be that way. You should not have to force producers to spend a great deal of money to go hire Washington law firms to pursue these cases.

Trade agreements ought to be negotiated aggressively on behalf of our producers in order to require and demand fair trade. But I wanted to make the point about State trading enterprises, which must be addressed in this new WTO round, because the STEs have dramatically injured American farmers and ranchers.

My expectation is that Senator CRAIG has discovered exactly the same circumstance in Idaho in terms of his ranchers and farmers trying to compete against sanctioned monopolies from other countries.

Mr. CRAIG. The Senator is absolutely right. When he speaks of Statetrading enterprises, the Canadian Wheat Board and the Australian Wheat Board control over one third of the world's wheat and wheat flour trade. As the Senator just explained, those negotiations are kept secret. Those trading enterprises buy the grain from farmers at the going market price. Then when they sell it, they do not report it. If they are to sell it well below the cost of the market, to get it into another country for purposes of sale, they sell it, and they are subsidized accordingly. If they can make money, they make money. But the point is, those kinds of transactions are not transparent. They are not reported.

In my State of Idaho, you can get a truckload of barley out of Canada to an elevator in Idaho cheaper than the farmer can bring it from across the street out of his field to that elevator. Why? Because that was a sale conducted by that particular trading enterprise, and it was sold well below the market, and, of course, that was not reported. You do not have marketplace competition. You cannot even understand it and compare figures, if you have no transparency in the marketplace. State trading enterprises are known for that, and we have asked our Secretary of Agriculture and our trade ambassador to go directly at this issue. Even the farmer of Canada now recognizes that this is also disadvantaging the producer in Canada, to have this kind of a monopolistic power controlling the grain trade of the world.

Mr. DORGAN. Mr. President, I have been pleased to work with Senator CRAIG and others in establishing this caucus. I will be in Seattle at the trade talks, as are many of my colleagues. We are determined this time to make sure that, at the end of these trade talks, we do better than we have done before on behalf of family farmers and ranchers.

Will Rogers said, I guess 60 years ago, the United States of America has never lost a war and never won a conference. He surely would have observed that if he had observed the trade negotiations that have occurred with Republican and Democratic administrations over recent decades. We are determined to try to change that. That is the purpose of this caucus.

I yield the floor.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, as I remember, the consent request was that this hour was to be used for debate on bankruptcy prior to 3. Is the time evenly divided, or how is the time designated?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is no division of time until 3.

PRIVILEGE OF THE FLOOR

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the following be granted the privilege of the floor for the bankruptcy bill: Kathy Curran, Jennifer Liebman, Lisa Bornstein.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, for over 100 years, Congress has supported a bankruptcy system that balances the needs of debtors in desperate financial straits and creditors who deserve repayment. Today, however, the tide is changing. Too often the complexity of the problems facing debtors is ignored. Critics, using the unfair rhetoric supplied by the credit industry, call bankruptcy an undeserved refuge for those who can't or won't manage their finances. Honest, hard-working, middle class families are unfairly characterized as dead-beats who abuse the bankruptcy system to avoid paying their debts. The result is the excessively harsh bankruptcy reform bill presented to the Senate.

During this debate, every Senator must ask one essential question—who are the winners and who are the losers if this bill becomes law. A fair analysis of the bill will lead members of the Senate to the same conclusion reached by House Judiciary Committee Chairman HENRY HYDE, who counted dozens of provisions that favor creditors. But, decency and dignity need not be victims of reform. Balanced bankruptcy legislation is our goal. Though we must address the needs of creditors, we must also consider the specific circumstances and market forces that push middle class Americans into bankruptcy.

Let's take the basic facts one by one.

Fact No. 1: The rising economic tide has not lifted all boats. Despite low unemployment, a booming stock market, and budget surpluses, Wall Street cheers when companies—eager to improve profits by down-sizing—lay off workers in large numbers. In 1998, layoffs were reported around the country in almost every industry—9,000 jobs were lost after the Exxon-Mobil merger; 5,500 jobs were lost after Deutsche Bank acquired Bankers Trust; Boeing laid off 9,000 workers; Johnson & Johnson laid off 4,100. Kodak has cut 30,000 jobs since the 1980s and 6,300 since 1997.

Often, when workers lose a good job, they are unable to recover. In a study of displaced workers in the early 1990s, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported that only about one-quarter of these workers were working at full-time jobs paying as much as or more than they had earned at the job they lost. Too often, laid-off workers are forced to accept part-time jobs, temporary jobs, and jobs with fewer benefits or no benefits at all.

Fact No. 2: Divorce rates have soared over the past 40 years. For better or for worse, more couples are separating, and the financial consequences are particularly devastating for women. Divorced women are four times more likely to file for bankruptcy than married women or single men. In 1999, 540,000 women who head their own households will file for bankruptcy to try to stabilize their economic lives. 200,000 of them will also be creditors trying to collect child support or alimony. The rest will be debtors struggling to make ends meet.

Fact No. 3: Over 43 million Americans have no health insurance, and many millions more are underinsured. Each year, millions of families spend more than 20 percent of their income on medical care, and older Americans are hit particularly hard. A June 1998 CRS Report states that even though Medicare provides near-universal health coverage for older Americans, half of this age group spend 14 percent or more of their after-tax income on health costs, including insurance premiums, co-payments and prescription drugs.

Fact No. 4: The credit card industry has engaged in a massive and unseemly nation-wide campaign to hook unsuspecting citizens on credit card debt. Credit card issuers logged 24 million telemarketing hours in 1996 and sent out 3.45 billion—billion—credit card solicitations in 1998. In an average month, 75 percent of all households in the country receive a credit card solicitation. In recent years, the credit card industry has also begun to offer new lines of credit targeted at people with low incomes—people they know can not afford to pile up credit card debt.

Facts such as these have reduced the economic stability of millions of American families, and have led to the sharp increase in the number of bankruptcy filings. Two out of every three bankruptcy filers have an employment problem. One out of every five bankruptcy filers has a health-care problem. Divorced or separated people are three times more likely than married couples to file for bankruptcy. Working men and women in economic free fall often have no choice except bankruptcy.

The bankruptcy system provides a second chance for these large numbers of Americans who would otherwise hit financial bottom. It offers an indispensable opportunity to stabilize their households after an economic crisis.

Clearly, we must deal with those who take advantage of the system and abuse it. Reform is necessary to stop repeat filers, eliminate the loophole provided by the homestead exemptions in several states, and prevent wealthy Americans from abusing the system to avoid paying their debts. But the credit card industry is abusing the system, too. Congress needs to deal with their abuses realistically and fairly, in a way that protects millions of struggling middle class and low-income families. It would be irresponsible for Congress to act only in ways that reward the credit card industry for its cynical manipulation of these families.

The drop in filings this year is ample indication that a harsh bankruptcy bill is not needed. Without any action by Congress, the number of bankruptcy filings is decreasing. It is estimated that there will be 100,000 fewer filings this year than in 1998—filings have dropped in 42 states. Leading economists believe that the bankruptcy crisis is self-correcting. As economics professor Lawrence Ausubel states,

> Lenders respond to an unexpected increase in personal bankruptcies by curtailing new lending to consumers teetering closest to bankruptcy, with or without new legislation. The high rates of default at the peak of the bankruptcy crisis began to impinge on the profitability of lending and—as a result—lenders tightened their underwriting standards. This is the non-legislative, free-market response which made the crisis abate.

Despite these facts, the Senate is pursuing legislation that is a taxpayer-funded administrative nightmare for struggling debtors.

Mr. President, I will include in the RECORD a list of the States that have seen a significant—and some not so significant—drop in the bankruptcy filings, comparing the second quarter of 1999 to the second quarter of 1998. It dropped more than 62 percent in the State of Oklahoma. It was down 1.19 percent in Arizona. Eight States have had some increase. It was two-tenths of 1 percent in Indiana, three-tenths of 1 percent in Utah, six-tenths of 1 percent in Wyoming. It was up nine-tenths of 1 percent in Montana, 3.3 percent in Oregon, 6 percent in South Dakota, 12 percent in Alaska, and 144 percent in Delaware.

I ask unanimous consent that this list be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, coming back to the basic and fundamental issue about who is supporting the legislation, who the winners are and who the losers are, I will include in the RECORD at this point the various organizations that are opposed to the legislation.

I ask unanimous consent that this list of organizations be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ORGANIZATIONS OPPOSED TO S. 625, THE BANKRUPTCY REFORM ACT

AMONG THE ORGANIZATIONS THAT HAVE VOICED THEIR OPPOSITION TO S. 625 ARE:

AFL–CIO, Alliance for Justice, American Association of University Women, American Federation of Government Employees (AFGE), American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees (AFSCME), American Medical Women's Association, Association for Children for Enforcement of Support, Inc. (ACES), Business and Professional Women/USA, Center for Law and Social Policy, Center for the Advancement of Public Policy, Center for the Child Care Workforce, Church Women United, Coalition of Labor Union Women, Communications Workers of America, Consumer Federation of America, Consumers Union, Equal Rights Advocates, Feminist Majority, Hadassh, International Assocication of Machinists & Aerospace Workers (IAM), International Brotherhood of Boilermakers, Iron Ship Builders, Blacksmiths, Forgers & Helpers, International Brotherhood of Teamsters, International Women's Insolvency & Restructuring Confederation, Ralph Nader, National Association of Commissions for Women.

National Black Women's Health Project, National Center for Youth Law, National Consumer Law Center, National Council for Jewish Women, National Council of Negro Women, National Council of Senior Citizens, National Organization for Women, National Partnership for Women and Families, National Women's Conference, National Women's Law Center, Northwest Women's Law Center, NOW Legal Defense and Education Fund, Public Citizen, Union of Needletrades, Industrial & Textile Employees (UNITE), United Automobiles, Aerospace and Agricultural Implement Workers of America/UAW, United Food & Commercial Workers International Union, United Steelworkers of America, U.S. Public Interest Research Group, Wider Opportunities for Women, The Woman Activist Fund, Women Employed, Women Work!, Women's Institute for Freedom of the Press, Women's Law Center of Maryland, Inc., YWCA of the U.S.A.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, this list represents virtually all of the children's protection groups—those groups that have been most identified with protecting women's economic and political rights, those groups that have been looking after workers' interests, and small business groups as well. Virtually every one of them are opposed to the underlying legislation.

As I mentioned in the Senate Judiciary Committee, I would like to hear those who are in favor of it point out one single group representing children, workers, women, or consumers who are for this bill. Just bring those names to us. Let's debate it. But we have none, zero.

It comes back to what we ought to be asking ourselves when we have this kind of a situation. Isn't it worthwhile that we find out who the winners are and who the losers are? If common sense is any indication, we will try to make a case that in justifies these comments. Virtually every one of the groups representing hard-working Americans—the men and women who work hard and play by the rules; and, in many instances, women who have been discriminated against for a wide variety of reasons and issues; children's groups who understand the importance of making sure that children's interests and their financial security will be protected—are universally opposed and say ''no'' to the bill. But we have others. The credit card companies say yes.

So it is interesting, as we are coming into the final hours of this session, we have another one of those situations where the Republican leadership is putting out on the floor of the U.S. Senate a bill the special interests—in this case, the credit card companies—are strongly in favor of, but threatens the economic interests of women and working people and children.

We have little time this afternoon to debate a minimum wage, which we have been virtually prohibited from doing before the Senate over the period of the last year. We are not even going to have an opportunity to debate something that could protect consumers, women, children, and workers on a Patients' Bill of Rights. That is being put off. But we have time to debate this issue. Why? Because the credit card companies have a very important and direct interest in the outcome of this particular legislation.

Mr. President, I want to take a few moments of the Senate's time to run through some of these charts that show, I think, very effectively, what this case is all about.

This chart shows that the U.S. median family income is $42,769 this year. Now these are constant dollars. If we look over at what the income was for those who went into bankruptcy, in 1981, 1991, 1995, and 1997, you find out there has been a gradual decline—$23,000, $18,000, $17,000, and in 1997 it was somewhat below what it was in 1995.

We have the greatest economic boom in the history of this country, with the lowest unemployment and rates of inflation. We saw an increase in the numbers of bankruptcies. But who are these people who are filing for bankruptcy? It is actually those in the lower incomes. That is who we are affecting with legislation that is dealing with bankruptcy. Who are these people down here in 1997? Let's look back in 1981. The red indicates joint filings. The yellow indicates men filing. The blue is for women filing.

Going back to 1981, we find the greatest number of filings for bankruptcy were joint filings, with some single men and some single women. Look what happens in 1991. Joint still goes up, and there are increasing numbers of women and of men. In 1999, those at the top are women. They are at the bottom in 1981 and at the top in 1999. Do you see the very dramatic increase in the number of women. Why is that so?

The reason that is so is women are being denied alimony and child support. That is why it is so. That is why it is so, Mr. President. Every indicator demonstrates that is why it is so. We are passing a major piece of legislation to protect not those who are being adversely impacted by these economic forces, but to protect the credit card industry. It is women who are facing challenges because of alimony and in terms of child support.

If you wanted to do something about this line here, you would do more to make sure the deadbeat dads are going to pay up as they should in terms of alimony and child support. You would see this number go down dramatically. Nonetheless, no, no, we are not going to deal with that issue. We have this other kind of formula that is going to hurt these people—not protect them so they might have a second opportunity. The fact is, the number of people who are working who go into bankruptcy is virtually identical to those who are working generally anyway.

Isn't that interesting? The fact is, these are not men and women who are dogging it, these are men and women who are out trying to make it. Nonetheless, are we considering a piece of legislation that is going to help them get back on their feet a second time and perhaps pay off their debt? No, no; we are thinking about the credit card companies and looking out after their interests.

So we see that the great expansion and explosion in the number of people who are going into bankruptcy are primarily women. Now it is interesting that bankrupt debtors are reporting job problems. Sixty-seven percent of those who are going into bankruptcy are reporting job problems, a direct result of downsizing, direct result of merging, the direct result of being able to go down to Wall Street and cut back in the total number of employees and see a bang in that stock going right up. Extraordinary economic growth and expansion—all of which are very fine and good—doesn't mean that you have to come down with a hammer on workers who, through no fault of their own, are being merged out and are having difficulty in finding jobs to try to meet their responsibilities, especially women.

This indicates what has been happening with regard to people who have been going into bankruptcy. More than 67 percent of them are showing that it is basically and fundamentally an issue in terms of their employment. These other colors indicate what those particular matters might be in terms of downsizing and the rest. We have some idea now.

We have the numbers I mentioned earlier. We have the growth in the number of men and women who are separated, become divorced, and the economic implications and burdens women are faced with in terms of credit. We find that.

Now let's look to see if there are other indicators. Yes, there is another very important indicator. That is the fact that we are seeing the total number of uninsured in our society growing at a rate of over a million a year. Make no mistake about it, that is going to increase and escalate. We are not doing anything about it. That is going to increase and escalate.

Isn't it interesting that health care-related problems driving individuals into bankruptcy are the No. 1 reason besides job related reasons. Individuals being dropped from the health care system are individuals at the lower end of the economic ladder who don't have the protections and don't have the health insurance in the first place.

We all know what is happening out in the job market with the increasing number of temps. So you do not have pensions and you do not have health insurance. Here we have the individuals who are losing out and falling further behind—women on credit, women on alimony, and women with challenges they have in terms of payments. Then you have the problems with downsizing.

Now we have one of the other major issues reflected in the bankruptcies that are taking place all across this country.

We know what is happening across the country in terms of many of the major companies and corporations that had good health care protection for retirees. Those numbers are going down in terms of coverage. We know the costs and what is happening in terms of prescription drugs. They are going up and escalating dramatically.

When we passed Medicare in 1964, the private sector didn't have prescription drugs, so Medicare didn't have it. Now 90 percent of those policies have it, but we can't even get that issue up before the Senate to debate it. We haven't got the chance to debate whether we ought to have prescription drugs. We don't get a chance to debate whether we ought to try to accept the House bill that provides protection for consumers from the arbitrary rulings of accountants in health maintenance organizations. No, we can't deal with any of that. Let's just look out after the credit card industry. They are the ones who need protection—not the men and women who have lost their health care. No, sir; we don't have to worry about them—not the men and women who have been downsized. No, sir; we don't have to worry about them; and not women. Alimony and child care support—let's not worry about them. Let's worry about the good old credit card industry.

Let's see what we have to worry about with them. What do you know? Here is a facsimile of a letter, Mr. President, which I ask unanimous consent be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AMERICAN BANKRUPTCY SERVICE,
St. Paul, MN, December 18, 1998.

Re Fresh Start VISA® Distributorship.

DEAR COUNSELOR: We offer a unique opportunity that could be of great benefit to your firm and your clients. By becoming a distributor, you will have the ability to market an unsecured VISA® credit card (the ''Fresh Start'' card) to your clients who:

Have filed a Chapter 7 bankruptcy;

Have completed the 341 meeting of creditors (with no outstanding issues with the Trustee);

Have not yet received their discharge;

Have attached a copy of the bankruptcy notice to their VISA application.

Several law firms specializing in representing consumer debtors in bankruptcy have requested the ability to distribute the ''Fresh Start'' VISA application to their clients. In light of this, we thought perhaps your firm would be interested also in a distributorship. For each credit card issued, your firm will receive $10.

There is absolutely no deposit required. This is an unsecured VISA card. The credit limit will be $500 or $1,000 depending on income. The annual fee is $49.00. Many debtors have immediate credit needs even during a bankruptcy. Some are approached either by secured credit card companies but cannot apply due to lack of the cash deposit required or by current creditors offering a new card only with a reaffirmation. This new card offer solves these problems. (See sample application enclosed.) Furthermore, our SuperSettlements program (brochure enclosed) provides an additional method for avoiding reaffirmations with small redemptions.

This program is intended to create a fresh start for your clients and an opportunity for your firm. We realize that many debtors may have to file a bankruptcy due to excessive credit card debt. If you feel that this is not a program for them or for your firm, please disregard this letter.

For more information, please fax or mail this form back to us. Please call if you have questions.

Yes! Our firm is interested in distributing the ''Fresh Start'' VISA card applications toour Chapter 7 clients. Please send us detailed information on how we can become a distributor as soon as possible. The name of the person at our firm to contract is:

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, here is the letter that is being sent by the ''American Bankruptcy Service,'' ''Re: Fresh Start VISA distributorship'':

Dear counselor:

Do you know who the counselors are? Do you know who those counselors are? They are counselors for the people who have gone bankrupt—the lawyers for people who have gone bankrupt. Here is their friendly ''American Bankruptcy Service.''

We offer a unique opportunity that could be of great benefit to your firm and your clients. By becoming a distributor, you will have the ability to market unsecured VISA credit cards. We call it the ''Fresh Start'' card to your clients who:

Have filed a chapter 7 bankruptcy;

Have completed the 341 meetings of creditors;

Have not yet received their discharge;

Have attached a copy of their bankruptcy notice.

No deposit required.

This industry is out soliciting from attorneys who have represented women and workers who have been downsized, those who have gone bankrupt and belly up because of health care bills they just can't afford to pay.

Now you have the credit card industry writing to the attorneys and saying: Look, you can get in on the goody trail, too, because if you represented one, you probably represented others, and you can get on and be part of our credit card distributorship as well.

That is what they are saying here. You can read this letter right through.

Our firm is interested in distributing the Fresh Start VISA.

And we will just show you how to do it. You can also be a part of this.

Here is their advertising.

If you have filed for bankruptcy, you can get a Fresh Start with First Consumers National Bank VISA card today. If you file bankruptcy, that qualifies you. There is no need to wait for a bankruptcy discharge. Rebuild a good credit card fast with monthly accounts reporting to all major credit card business.

They have got you once. They want to get you again, and again, and again. How many times do they want to get these people? How many times?

We are out here debating this bill in the final couple of days. We are not debating a patients' bill of rights. We had a heck of a time trying to get a debate on minimum wage for the whole session—trying to make a difference for consumers. We haven't got time to do prescription drugs—no way, too difficult, too complex. But we have all the time in the world to debate this particular legislation that is looking out after the credit card companies.

That gives you some idea about what the Republican leadership's priorities are here in the Senate.

We will have a chance later on to talk about the minimum wage. We have gone ahead and voted ourselves a $4,600 pay increase this year and we still won't vote a pay increase of 50 cents next year for men and women who are at the bottom rung of the economic ladder.

What is this, Mr. President? We have to ask ourselves, Why?

I can tell you, Mr. President. These issues ought to be addressed. A number of our colleagues have offered amendments to try to address some of these issues. It is going to take a lot of doing to try to make the difference. We are talking about real people.

Take for example, Mr. and Mrs. M who live in the suburban community of East Longmeadow, Massachusetts. Although Mr. M. makes about $60,000 per year, the family suffered when Mrs. M lost her job, and the household income dropped by $15,000. Since then, the family has struggled to make ends meet. The $14,775 loan for their 1996 Toyota and the $1,520 monthly mortgage payment that once seemed reasonable became difficult to meet.

Even after cutting recreation expenses to zero, the family's expenses exceed their income by several hundred dollars a month. They fell behind on their credit card payments, which they had hoped to resume paying when Mrs. M started working again. The balance they owed to their credit card company ballooned to $27,500. The balance increased by $600 to $800 each month in finance charges and penalties. Mr. and Mrs. M saw no alternative to filing for relief under the bankruptcy laws. Their discharge in bankruptcy gave them a fresh start. They will continue to struggle to make ends meet, but they have relief from the pressures of harassing calls from collection agents and mounting debts they had no hope of paying.

If this bill—S. 625—had been law, they would have had no such relief. The means test—which uses IRS expense standards to calculate living expenses and ability to repay debts—would probably force them out of the bankruptcy system, completely.

Longmeadow is in Hampden County, where the IRS housing and utility allowance for a family of four is $1,235 a month. Although the family's mortgage and monthly utility expenses exceed this amount, it would not matter. Under this bill, they would face a statutory presumption that their case is abusive. The arbitrary means test—not the reality of their plight—dictates that Mr. and Mrs. M can afford to file a Chapter 13 debt repayment plan, and it is highly unlikely that the family has any ''special circumstances'' that would allow a judge to find differently.

They will be selling their home, possibly all their assets.

This is unduly harsh. It should not pass in its current form. I will work with a number of our colleagues to address many of these serious abuses, without which it should not become law.

I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative assistant proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, we are on legislation we started Thursday night. We had discussion this Friday, although we had no votes on any amendments to the bankruptcy reform bill. I hope we can move forward with this legislation and get it passed before we adjourn.

This is the same piece of legislation that passed the Senate by a 97–1 vote in 1998. It was conferenced with the House. The conference committee report passed the House of Representatives by a very wide margin. The bill came to the Senate in the last 3 or 4 days of the session with a threat of long debates and filibusters against the conference report. Consequently, a bill that passed 97–1, probably coming out of the conference more favorable to the point of view of those who still had some questions about it. Yet a lot of those Members did not want that bill to go to final passage. Therefore, the last Congress ended with the bankruptcy conference report not passing.

We started over again in the new Congress. Since the first of the year, Senator TORRICELLI of New Jersey and I have been working on this legislation to bring our colleagues a bipartisan approach to bankruptcy reform that we hope will end the situation of some people who have the ability to repay some debt getting off scot-free. We think this legislation is a big step in that direction.

In my earlier statements on the Senate floor on Thursday and Friday, I alluded to the role that overly aggressive bankruptcy lawyers play in the current crisis of our bankruptcy system. Although I cannot statistically support it, when I refer to the role of overly aggressive bankruptcy lawyers I really think, in my heart, we are talking about a very small minority of bankruptcy lawyers. Still, there are those who play a role in people going into bankruptcy who I do not think the bankruptcy laws were ever intended to help, or, in any case, harming people who have a debt owed to them which is not paid.

One of the major problems with the bankruptcy system is the mind-set of some of the lawyers who specialize in bankruptcy. Many lawyers today view bankruptcy simply as an opportunity to make money for themselves with a minimal amount of effort. And this profit motive causes bankruptcy lawyers to promote bankruptcy even when a financially troubled client has the obvious ability to repay his or her debts. As one of the members of the National Bankruptcy Commission noted in the Commission's 1997 report, many who make their living off of thebankruptcy process have forgotten that declaring bankruptcy has a moral dimension. Bankruptcy lawyers shouldn't counsel someone to walk away from his or her debts without pointing out the moral consequences of making a promise to pay and then breaking that promise. As I have said before, it cannot be good for the moral foundation of our nation if people learn that it is okay just to walk away and not pay your bills because that's easier and more convenient, and obviously better for somebody's pocketbook.

All across America some of the more unsavory bankruptcy lawyers have created high-volume law offices that herd people into bankruptcy as if they were cattle instead of individual human beings in need of advice and counseling. These offices are known as bankruptcy mills. These bankruptcy mills are nothing more than large scale processing centers for bankruptcy—there is little or no investigation done as to whether an individual actually needs bankruptcy protection or whether or not a person is able to at least partially repay their debts. For example, one bankruptcy attorney from Texas was sanctioned by a bankruptcy court for operating a bankruptcy mill. According to the court, this attorney had very little knowledge of bankruptcy law, but advertised extensively in the yellow pages and on television. Apparently, his advertising worked, because he filed about 100 new bankruptcy cases per month. Most of the work was done by legal assistants with very limited training. The court concluded that the attorney's services

Amount to little more than a large scale petition preparer service for which he receives an unreasonably high fee.

The practices of bankruptcy mills are so deceptive and sleazy that the Federal Trade Commission went so far as to issue a consumer alert warning consumers of misleading ads promising debt consolidation.

I refer you to this Federal Trade Commission Consumer News Bulletin, right here on this chart. It refers to a question, Debt Got You Down? You are not alone. Consumer debt is at an all-time high. What's more, record numbers of consumers—more than 1 million in 1996—are filing for bankruptcy. Whether your debt dilemma is the result of an illness, unemployment, or simply overspending, it can seem overwhelming. In your effort to get solvent, be on the alert for advertisements that offer seemingly quick fixes. While the ads pitch the promise of debt relief, they rarely say relief may be spelled b-a-n-k-r-u-p-t-c-y. And, although bankruptcy is one option to deal with financial problems, it's generally considered the option of last resort. The reason: Its long-term negative impact on your creditworthiness. A bankruptcy stays on your credit report for 10 years, and can hinder your ability to get credit, a job, insurance, or even a place to live.

I think that there is a widespread recognition that bankruptcy lawyers are preying on unsophisticated consumers who need counseling and help with setting up a budget, but who do not need to declare bankruptcy. It is not surprising, Mr. President, that bankruptcy lawyers are leading the charge against bankruptcy reform.

Now, we have heard complaints from some on the Senate floor about protecting child support and alimony during bankruptcy proceedings. I want to point out that some bankruptcy lawyers actually advertise that they can help deadbeat dads get out of paying their child support and other marital obligations. One bankruptcy lawyer has even written a book entitled ''Discharging Marital Obligations in Bankruptcy.'' Some things about that book are displayed on this chart.

I think that it is outrageous that bankruptcy lawyers are helping deadbeats to cheat divorced spouses out of alimony and to cheat children out of child support. This is a recipe for promoting poverty and human misery. Those who are concerned about protecting child support should join with me in condemning this sort of amoral conduct. Bankruptcy was never designed for the purpose of helping deadbeat spouses escape their financial obligations. Not only are the current practices of bankruptcy lawyers a disservice to their clients, they also cheat society as a whole.

Mr. President, I ask consent to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an article from the Los Angeles Times dated August 12, 1998.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

2.5% RISE IN PERSONAL FILINGS PUSHES BANKRUPTCIES TO NEW HIGH

[From Times Staff and Wire Reports]

Total bankruptcies nationwide hit a record high in the second quarter, apparently boosted by a flurry of personal filings by people who fear imminent changes in the bankruptcy law.

Business bankruptcies continued to decline, but personal bankruptcies, which account for 97% of the filings, edged up 2.5% from the second quarter a year earlier. That pushed the total number of bankruptcy filings to 373,460 in April, May and June, surpassing by nearly 2% the previous high posted in the second quarter of 1997, federal court officials said this week. California's figures mirrored the nationwide trend.

Although a 2% rise is not large, given the steady and previously sharper increases in bankruptcies in recent years, analysts were still surprised by the continuing uptick in personal filings. The economy remains relatively strong and consumer delinquencies in general have come down in recent quarters while some lenders have tightened their credit standards.

But bankruptcy attorneys and other experts said some consumers were being prompted by pending bankruptcy reform legislation, which could take effect as early as the fall and is expected to make it tougher for consumers to extinguish their debts.

Indeed, attorneys are advising their clients that they may want to take advantage of the current law while it is still available.

''I'm telling clients that it might very well end up being harder to file for bankruptcy,'' said Joseph Weber, a bankruptcy lawyer in Costa Mesa. Weber added that he also thinks a ''false optimism'' is adding to the number of bankruptcy petitions. ''When they perceive the economy to be better, some spend beyond their means,'' he said.

Mr. GRASSLEY. In this article, bankruptcy lawyers are advised to send out letters to anyone who has visited them recently asking about bankruptcy. This form letter encourages people to declare bankruptcy because, if Congress passes bankruptcy reform, ''Bankruptcy will be much more difficult, more expensive, and probably embarrassing.'' I hope this bill makes bankruptcy more embarrassing and more difficult. Opinion polls clearly show that the American people want those who voluntarily incur debts to pay those debts as agreed. Bankruptcy should be difficult, and the moral stigma that used to be associated with bankruptcy should be resurrected.

I have reviewed the conduct of bankruptcy mills and bankruptcy lawyers to illustrate the need for Congress to hold bankruptcy lawyers accountable for unethical and dishonest conduct. In the bill before us, we have tried to do this by codifying rule 11 penalties for lawyers who needlessly steer people into the bankruptcy system. It's my hope that these penalties will cause lawyers to think twice before they willy-nilly cart off their clients to bankruptcy court without asking a few questions first. I would have preferred tougher penalties, as we had in last year's Senate Bill, But I understand that many on the other side of the aisle strongly object to tougher penalties. So, in an effort to work with the other side, this year's penalties aren't as tough as they were last year.

As I've said many times, the bankruptcy crisis is partly a moral crisis. And bankruptcy lawyers who push bankruptcy play the role of carnival barkers who promise an easy way out to anyone who will listen.

As it stands now, this bankruptcy reform bill, S. 625, merely requires attorneys to investigate the financial resources of their clients before putting them into bankruptcy. That is not too much to ask and, it seems to me, something basic when advising people according to the tenets of the legal profession.

Our bankruptcy system needs to be reformed in a balanced way. We need to address abuses by debtors who do not need bankruptcy. We need to address abuses by creditors who use coercive and deceptive practices to cheat honest debtors. And we need to address abuses by bankruptcy lawyers who exploit bankruptcy laws for financial gain.

As I said before, I prefer tougher penalties against bankruptcy lawyers, but this bill is a step in the direction of addressing the problems of fast-talking bankruptcy lawyers.

Does the Senator from Minnesota seek the floor?

Mr. WELLSTONE. Mr. President, I know we are going to start on the minimum wage amendment. May I have 1 minute to call up two amendments and then lay them aside?

Mr. GRASSLEY. Yes. I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments are set aside. The Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, raising the minimum wage is critical to preventing the economic free fall that often leads to bankruptcy. Many of us have sponsored the Fair Minimum Wage Act of 1999 to begin to right that wrong.

Amending the bankruptcy bill to increase the minimum wage will help many of the people this so-called bankruptcy ''reform'' is likely to hurt—low income families, minorities and women. For many low income workers, the struggle to make ends meet is too difficult, and they find themselves facing bankruptcy. Raising the minimum wage will help many of these hard-working individuals and families recover from the financial crises that drove them into bankruptcy.

For nearly two-thirds of the families that file for bankruptcy, a job crisis led to their downfall. Many of those families faced a job loss. A Bureau of Labor Statistics study reported that only about a quarter of displaced workers had found a new job at the same or better pay as the job they lost. A third of displaced workers were still looking for work. Nearly half of the displaced workers had to settle for work at much lower salaries—an average 20% pay cut for those lucky enough to find full time jobs, and a much steeper cut for those who took part-time work.

Large numbers of women who will suffer under this bill will benefit from a minimum wage increase. Divorced women are four times more likely to file for bankruptcy than married women or single men. Often, they are forced into bankruptcy because they are owed child support or alimony. Divorced women trying to raise children face a daunting challenge to provide for their families. This bill will make it harder to meet that challenge. But raising the minimum wage will help almost seven million women, many of them struggling to maintain their families.

African American and Hispanic families disproportionately face the threat of bankruptcy and the repercussions of a low minimum wage. They are six times more likely than other Americans to seek bankruptcy protection, and they will be disproportionately harmed by this bankruptcy bill. But they also comprise one-third of those who will benefit from an increase in the minimum wage. This amendment will help more African American and Hispanic families meet their families' needs.

Low income families struggling to meet their obligations often find themselves facing bankruptcy. Some argue that the rise in bankruptcy filings is due to a lack of responsibility. But too often the problem is a matter of basic household economics. Families going into bankruptcy have less income than most Americans. A raise in the minimum wage will give them the economic boost they need to avoid bankruptcy.

Our proposal will give these low income wage earners the pay raise they need and deserve to care more effectively for their families—to buy the food and clothing, and health care they need, without going into debt.

Recently, members of Congress voted to raise their own pay by $4,600—but not the pay of minimum wage workers. Republican Senators don't blink about giving themselves an increase. How can they possibly deny a fair increase for minimum wage workers?

In fact, the Republican leadership has gone to extraordinary lengths to block action by Congress on a pay raise for the hard-working Americans who work at the minimum wage.

But it is time—long past time—to raise the minimum wage. Too many hard-working Americans struggling to keep their families afloat and their dignity intact can't make enough in a 40 hour week to lift their families out of poverty—and that's wrong. The percentage of poor who are full-time year-round workers was 12.6% in 1998—higher than any time in the last 20 years, according to a new report from the Census Bureau.

Our minimum wage amendment is a modest proposal— a one dollar increase in two installments—50 cents next January, and 50 cents the following year. Over 11 million American workers will benefit.

At $6.15 an hour, working full-time, a minimum wage worker would earn $12,800 a year under this amendment—an increase of over $2,000 a year.

That additional $2,000 will pay for seven months of groceries to feed the average family. It will pay the rent for five months. It will pay for almost ten months of utilities. It will cover a year and a half of tuition and fees at a two-year college, and provide greater opportunities for those struggling at the minimum wage to obtain the skills needed to obtain better jobs.

The national economy is the strongest in a generation, with the lowest unemployment rate in three decades. Under the leadership of President Clinton, our economy is strong. Enterpriseand entrepreneurship are flourishing—generating unprecedented economic growth, with impressive efficiencies and significant job creation. The stock market has soared. Inflation is low, and interest rates are low. We are witnessing the strongest peacetime growth in our history.

The country as a whole is enjoying an unprecedented period of growth and prosperity. But for millions of Americans it is someone else's prosperity. Working 40 hours a week, 52 weeks a year, a person earning the minimum wage would earn only $10,700—almost $3,200 below the poverty guidelines for a family of three.

Each day we fail to raise the minimum wage, families across the country continue to fall farther behind. One fact says it all—the minimum wage would have to be $7.49 an hour today, instead of the current level of $5.15, to have the same purchasing power it had in 1968. That disparity shows how far we have fallen short in the past generation in guaranteeing that low income workers receive their fair share of the nation's prosperity.

The Republican proposal to raise the minimum wage by one dollar over three years beginning on March 1, 2000, is a cruel hoax on the lowest paid American workers. Our Democratic plan to increase the minimum wage by 50 cents on January 1, 2000 and another 50 cents on January 1, 2001, would put almost $1,200 more than the Republican proposal into the hands of the hard-working women and men who work at the minimum wage.

The Republican proposal is an insult to low wage workers. In addition to robbing workers of over $1,200, it effectively repeals the overtime pay law that has guaranteed time-and-a-half overtime pay for over 60 years. The so-called ''bonus'' provision of the Republican proposal jeopardizes the overtime pay of 73 million Americans by eliminating the requirement that bonuses, commissions, and other similar forms of compensation be included in a worker's regular pay for purposes of calculating overtime pay. As the United States Supreme Court said in interpreting the Fair Labor Standards Act, exclusion of bonuses from overtime pay will ''nullify all the purposes for which the [Act] was created.''

The Republican proposal is just one more part of an ongoing assault on low wage workers that includes balancing the budget on the backs of the working poor; cutting workers' pay through the compensatory time bill; providing pensions for the wealthy but not for working families; blocking workers' right to organize; and undermining worker safety and health.

Shame on those who want to lavish over $75 billion in tax breaks on business, while cutting this modest pay raise for low income workers. Republicans are more interested in providing tax breaks for the rich than in fairly compensating minimum wage workers. When Congress has just voted to raise its own pay, it is hypocritical and irresponsible to deny fair pay for the country's lowest paid workers.

As the Washington Post said last week: ''The minimum wage should be increased, and the increase should not become a political football. . . . The price of a bill to help the working poor ought not be an indiscriminate tax cut for those at the very top of the economic mountain.''

Our legislation does contain a fiscally responsible package of small business tax provisions which would cost approximately $11.5 billion over the next five years. Those provisions have been designed to provide financial assistance to the small businesses which will be paying the higher minimum wage to their employees. The cost of these tax benefits is fully paid for.

Unlike the Republican proposals, this bill will not draw down the surplus. It will not jeopardize our ability to use the surplus to strengthen Medicare and Social Security for the future. Our tax proposal contains provisions which will benefit both employers and employees. It provides a tax credit for worksite child care facilities, a tax credit to encourage small businesses to offer employee pensions, and a tax credit for companies that provide high tech training to their employees. It also encourages the creation of new jobs for those who are currently outside the workforce by extending the work opportunity tax credit and the welfare-to-work tax credit, and by establishing tax incentives for ''new market'' community development.

In addition, our package accelerates the deductibility of health insurance premiums for self-employed workers. It excludes educational benefits provided for employees' children from taxation, and it helps workers save for their retirement.

These are the types of tax provisions that Congress should be enacting. They are tax cuts which will benefit a broad spectrum of businesses and workers and strengthen the economy. They are not tax breaks which only further enrich an already privileged few.

This debate should be about the real financial needs of low income workers and small businesses. A modest increase in the minimum wage should not be held hostage to the desire for extravagant new tax breaks for those who are already the most economically privileged. It makes sense to provide fiscally responsible tax assistance to small businesses and their employees. All the tax cuts we are proposing are fully paid for and carefully targeted to meet genuine needs. It is appropriate to enact them as part of our legislation to raise the minimum wage.

Finally, raising the minimum wage is far more than a labor issue. Raising the minimum wage is a women's issue. Almost 60 percent of minimum wage workers are women. 7 million women across the nation—12.6% of all working women—would benefit from this increase.

Raising the minimum wage is a children's issue. Over two million married couples and almost a million mothers would receive a pay raise as a result of our increase. Eighty-five percent of these single mothers have total household incomes below $25,000 a year.

Raising the minimum wage is a civil rights issue. Over two million Hispanic workers and almost as many African American workers will receive a raise. Together, they make up one-third of those who will benefit from the increase.

Raising the minimum wage is a family issue. The average minimum wage worker brings home half the family earnings. Half the benefits of our one dollar increase will go to households earning less than $25,000 a year. Parents need this raise so they can provide their children with food, clothes, and a decent place to live.

Some of our colleagues who oppose the minimum wage still believe the dire ''sky is falling'' predictions of economic disaster that were raised before we voted to raise the minimum wage in 1996. None of those predictions came true. Since the last increase enacted by Congress, the economy has created new jobs at a rate of over 235,000 a month. Job creation in the sectors most affected by the minimum wage is up too—with almost 1.2 million new jobs in the retail sector, and 400,000 new jobs in restaurants. Employment is up—and the unemployment rate is down—among teenagers, African Americans, Hispanics, and women.

As Business Week magazine has stated,

> [H]igher minimum wages are supposed to lead to fewer jobs. Not today. In a fast-growth, low-inflation economy, minimum wages raise income, not unemployment. . . . A higher minimum wage can be an engine for upward mobility. When employees become more valuable, employers tend to boost training and install equipment to make them more productive. Higher wages at the bottom often lead to better education for both workers and their children. . . . It is it time to set aside old assumptions about the minimum wage.

It is time to raise the federal minimum wage. No one who works for a living should have to live in poverty. I urge my colleagues to join me in raising the minimum wage.

AMENDMENT NO. 2751

(Purpose: To amend the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 to increase the Federal minimum wage)

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I call up amendment No. 2751.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

> The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] proposes an amendment numbered 2751.

(The text of the amendment is printed in today's RECORD under ''Amendments Submitted.'')

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield whatever time the leader desires. I understand we have a time agreement; am I correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There are going to be 2 hours evenly divided.

Mr. KENNEDY. May I inquire again, what is the time agreement? I understand there are going to be two amendments—one offered by Senator DASCHLE and one offered by Senator NICKLES or Senator LOTT. We were going to debate both of those this afternoon and vote on them tomorrow. Can the Chair tell me how much time we are allocated this afternoon to debate the two amendments?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There will be 2 hours of time evenly divided on each of those two amendments.

Mr. KENNEDY. For this afternoon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes, for this afternoon.

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield whatever time the leader wants.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Ms. COLLINS). The minority leader.

Mr. DASCHLE. Madam President, I appreciate the clarification. That was the understanding. So there is no confusion, we now have 4 hours of debate on the two amendments.

I appreciate the opportunity to come to the floor at this point to talk about the amendment offered on behalf of our colleagues, but really on behalf of the 11 million Americans who will benefit from this minimum wage once it is passed into law.

I thank especially Senator KENNEDY for his extraordinary leadership and persistence in making sure this issue was addressed prior to the end of the first session of this Congress. Were it not for his dedication and extraordinary efforts, we would not be here this afternoon.

I also thank Senators ROBB and BAUCUS for the leadership they have provided, and I thank many of our colleagues for their strong support for this legislation.

We fought all year long to bring this amendment to the floor because low-income working families need and deserve a raise. The average American family now works an additional 265 hours a year just to maintain the same standard of living they had at the beginning of this decade. That is an additional 6 weeks a year. We believe it is time parents could be spending attending parent-teacher conferences or playing with their children or maybe just reading Harry Potter with them. It is time husbands and wives could be talking with each other. It is not enough just to talk about family values, we need to show by our actions that we value families. We need to raise the minimum wage, and we need to do it this year—now.

I recently met a young father in South Dakota who told me that he and his wife eat only one meal a week together, and that is on Sundays after church. The rest of the week, his work schedule keeps him away from his family because he has more than one job.

He is one of many workers in this Nation who are working three jobs, two of them at minimum wage, just to make ends meet. We can do better than that. In this economy, we must do better than that. We are in the longest, strongest period of economic recovery in our Nation's history. The stock market and worker productivity are both at record highs.

It has been 3 years since the last time we increased the minimum wage, and if we do not pass another increase now, by the end of this month the purchasing power of the minimum wage will have fallen to the lowest point it has been in 40 years. The real value of the minimum wage is now at almost $2.50 below what it was in 1968—$2.50 an hour.

We are proposing we raise the minimum wage, not by the $2.50 required to get back to the parity level of 1968, but $1 an hour over 2 years. That is as modest a proposal as anyone can propose. Under it, the minimum-wage worker who now works full time would earn only $12,792 a year, but it would be $2,000 more than he or she now earns.

After doing all they could for as long as they could to block any increase in the minimum wage, now our Republican colleagues have their own proposal. They will raise the minimum wage, but they are saying to working families: ''We are not going to let you have it in 2 years. We know now you will only be making $12,792, but we want you to wait 3 years for your raise. But we are for family values, we are for helping people get ahead.''

They want to believe there is not a dime's worth of difference between their plan and our plan. That is not so. There are at least three major differences.

First, this 3-year delay is going to cost a typical working family $1,200 over 3 years. That is what that delay costs. I know around here that does not sound like a lot of money, but to a family trying to scrape by on minimum wage, it is 10 percent of a year's income; $1,200 a year is 3 months' worth of rent. It is 4 months' worth of groceries; it is 6 months' worth of utilities; and it is 1 year in tuition and fees at a 2-year college.

So there is a big difference. Do not let anybody say that simply waiting another year for that full dollar benefit is a minor matter. We are talking rent; we are talking utilities; we are talking groceries. It is whether or not in some cases families are going to have two or three meals a week together or whether that one meal on Sunday will have to do.

The second difference between our proposal and the Republican proposal has to do with the tax cuts. We offer tax cuts. I really do not think there is any connection, frankly, between the minimum wage and the need for tax cuts. Each ought to be considered in their own right.

I am troubled a little bit about this tendency to want to marry tax cuts into something that is important to do in its own right. But I do understand the importance of providing meaningful tax relief targeted to small businesses. I am for that. And our caucus, and I hope the Senate, is for that.

We offer a tax cut package that will cost $28.5 billion over 10 years. But the tax breaks the Republican plan entails would cost $75 billion—over twice as much. It is not just the cost that worries me, it is the fact that the Republican tax cuts are not paid for.

We have heard all of this railing about Social Security trust funds. But the Republicans do not seem to be too concerned about Social Security when it comes to this tax cut. While they pay for the first year, there is absolutely no money for the tax cuts the second through the 10th years. What that means is that it is going to have to come out of education, other priorities, or even Social Security.

The third difference between our tax cuts and the Republicans' is this: Our tax cuts target small businesses and family farms. The Republican tax breaks overwhelmingly benefit those in the top end of the income strata.

A minimum wage increase ought to be able to pass, as I said a moment ago, on its own merits. If we are going to include tax cuts, they ought to reduce the impact, as marginal as it is, of a minimum wage increase on the businesses that will be most affected by it. The Republican proposal fails this basic test of fairness, relevance, and fiscal responsibility.

How would the Democratic tax cuts help small businesses and family farms?

First, we lower the cost to small businesses of making investments by raising to $25,000 the amount of an investment a business can write off immediately. If you make a $25,000 investment, you can write it off in the first year and you do not have to wait. That is one way to help small businesses.

They tell me time and again we have to encourage them to reinvest and to put more money back into their businesses. There is no better way to do that than to say: make an investment and you can expense it immediately. We do that.

Second, we provide a tax cut of up to $4,000 to cover startup costs of adopting a pension plan so more small businesses can offer their workers pensions. This not only helps businesses, it helps the workers, and it helps businesses attract good workers and increases workers' retirement security. It is a win-win.

In this day and age, what business people tell me all through South Dakota, as they are attempting to compete for a very limited workforce, is that there has to be an incentive to be able to recruit and then ultimately to retain good people. There is nothing more important in retaining good people than ensuring that in the long term they are not only going to have a good income but they are going to have a good retirement. This package does it.

Third, we accelerate the full deductibility of health insurance for the self-employed. We have already provided fulldeductibility, and now we move it up. We more rapidly incorporate fulldeductibility, so that every small business can benefit in providing health insurance in those cases when they are self-employed.

Fourth, our proposal raises the special estate tax exemption for family-owned small businesses and farms by $450,000.

Fifth, we make it easier for farm cooperatives to raise capital.

Finally, and very importantly, we provide tax relief to farmers who are experiencing losses during the current crisis.

That is how our tax cuts help small businesses and family farms.

But our proposal also contains tax cuts to help low-income workers. We extend the successful work opportunity and the welfare-to-work tax credits for 5 years. We increase tax incentives for entrepreneurs to invest in empowerment zones. First-round empowerment zones have shown that wage tax credits are a valuable economic development tool.

Currently, there are no wage tax credits available for round 2 zones. By making these tax credits available, by building on what we know works, we can bring new jobs and opportunities to places such as the Pine Ridge Reservation empowerment zone in South Dakota and other communities that desperately need opportunities like it.

We also include in our plan the President's new markets tax credit to help people in communities that have so far not shared in the country's record economic prosperity. The new markets tax credit will encourage private capital to flow into equity investments in businesses in these areas. Bipartisan support for this proposal is growing, and it is extremely fitting to include it in a proposal to raise the minimum wage.

Our tax cut is smart; it is strategic; and I emphasize, it is paid for. I especially commend Senators ROBB and BAUCUS for their efforts in helping to develop it. As members of the Senate Finance Committee, they have done an outstanding job of ensuring that as we look at the array of tax tools that would be helpful to workers and small businesses, we put the tightest, most targeted, most focused package together. And they have done it in this amendment.

The third difference between our minimum wage plan and the one our colleagues are offering is simply this: The President will sign our plan. The Republican proposal is absolutely dead on arrival.

Now, we know we will hear dire warnings from some of our colleagues on the other side. They will say raising the minimum wage will actually hurt low-income workers because employers will be forced to cut minimum-wage jobs.

We now know that is nonsense. We have study after study that proves raising the minimum wage does not kill jobs at all. In fact, since the last time we raised the minimum wage—in 1996—American employers have created nearly 9 million new jobs. In my State, 17,000 new jobs have been created. The national unemployment rate has fallen from 5.2 percent to just over 4 percent—the lowest jobless rate in 30 years. Even the Wall Street Journal and Business Week now say the 1996 predictions about job losses were wrong.

Another argument we will surely hear from our friends in the other party is that increasing the minimum wage has nothing to do with increasing family incomes. They will argue that most minimum-wage workers are teenagers who are working part time to pay for cars and CD players.

Again, the facts show otherwise. According to the Bureau of Labor Statistics, 70 percent of all minimum-wage workers are 20 years old or older; nearly 60 percent are women; and 40 percent are sole breadwinners in their families.

Our economy is the strongest it has been in my lifetime. But behind the prosperity, there are still far too many families who are working too hard, too long, for too little pay.

In South Dakota, while many families are moving ahead, too many others are being left behind, creating, in effect, two South Dakotas. On the surface, South Dakota is fortunate. Our unemployment rate is 2.6 percent, one of the lowest in the Nation. But in some of our counties, unemployment is as high as 7 percent. South Dakota is also the home to the poorest community in America, the Pine Ridge Indian Reservation.

There are good people—hard-working people—all across this country, who are struggling to make ends meet on minimum-wage jobs. They need a raise. And they are not alone. That is why religious leaders around the country today are urging us to raise the minimum wage.

It is critical that we not miss this opportunity. A job isn't just a source of income; it ought to be a source of pride. The U.S. Catholic Conference tells us the minimum wage should reflect principles of human dignity and economic justice. Unfortunately, today's minimum wage does not do that.

I want to read something that I think probably puts it in perspective quite well. This is a quote that is not one of mine, and not one of Senator KENNEDY's. It is a quote made by former majority leader Bob Dole the last time the Congress voted to raise the minimum wage in 1996. Bob Dole said at the time: ''I never thought the Republican Party would stand for squeezing every nickel out of the minimum wage.''

He was right then. If he were on the floor today, he would be right now. If we don't pass a minimum wage increase by the end of next month, more inflation will have wiped out the entire increase he was referring to in 1996. We cannot allow that to happen. It is time we stopped squeezing every last nickel out of the minimum wage. It is time to raise the minimum wage the right way, $1 an hour over 2 years, with responsible targeted tax cuts to help small business owners and family farmers, not an unpaid-for tax windfall for all those who need it the least.

Madam President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DASCHLE. Madam President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DASCHLE. Madam President, I ask unanimous consent that the time I have just consumed be taken from my leader time for today.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DASCHLE. I yield the floor.

Mr. KENNEDY addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. KENNEDY. Madam President, I yield myself 15 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is recognized.

Mr. KENNEDY. Madam President, it has taken us a long time during this Congress to have the opportunity to present a legislative proposal to the Senate that would provide an increase in the minimum wage for America's workers who are working on the lower rung of the economic ladder: 50 cents next year and 50 cents the following year.

We have tried to bring this before the Senate over the year in a number of different forms and shapes. We were unable to do so. Now we have the opportunity to debate it this afternoon and to vote on it tomorrow. Hopefully, we will have success in passing it.

It is very clear that its outcome is uncertain because of the fact that, rather than having a chance to vote on a freestanding piece of legislation that would be considered freely and then considered by the House, passed on to the Senate, this will be wrapped into other extremely controversial legislation. But we are doing the best that we can. We want to give assurances to those Americans who are working at the minimum wage that we are going to continue this battle, as we have over these past years. We are going to continue the battle next year at each and every opportunity, until we have the chance to pass meaningful minimum wage legislation. So there should be no doubt in anyone's mind that this somehow is going to conclude the debate.

American workers are entitled to an increase in the minimum wage. We are prepared to make their cases. I am absolutely convinced we will be successful.

It is unfortunate we have to try and convince our colleagues on the other side on the basis of the merits of this case, but I think it is important that we, in a preliminary way, address some of the reasons that have been raisedhistorically against the minimum wage.

First of all, let's look at where we are on the issue of the minimum wage. This chart reflects where the minimum wage has been since 1967–1968. These are real dollars. We see that if the minimum wage today was going to have the purchasing power it had in 1968, it would be $7.49, not $5.15 an hour. It would be about $2.30 higher than where it is today. What we have seen is a gradual decline of the purchasing power of the minimum wage. This is so despite the fact that we now have the greatest economic prosperity in the history of the country—more Americans employed, the greatest stock market, lowest interest rates, lowest rates of inflation, lowest unemployment, highest rate of employment in the history of the country. Nonetheless, for those individuals who are at the lower end of the economic ladder, they are slipping further and further and further behind.

If our amendment does not pass, the purchasing power of the minimum wage will continue to decline—to the lowest minimum wage almost in the history of the country. Every day that we delay, minimum-wage workers fall further behind. If we don't raise the minimum wage by the end of this year, it will lose all of the value of the last increase in 1996. This is where we are.

Now, what are we talking about in scope in terms of the minimum wage? How large an increase are we talking about? And what will be its impact in terms of our total economy? Increasing the minimum wage by a dollar is vital to workers, but it is a drop in the bucket of the national payroll.

If you combine their wages and salaries, all Americans earn $4.2 trillion a year. An increase of $1 in the minimum wage would amount to one-fifth of 1 percent in terms of total wages over the country. We should not even hear the argument—and I hope we won't—that this effort to raise the minimum wage is somehow going to be inflationary. We are talking about one-fifth of 1 percent of total wages for those who are working 40 hours a week 52 weeks a year. In a moment, I will come to that. More of them are working 50 hours a week, trying to play by the rules, trying to bring up a family and they are still coming up short.

This is what is happening. We are finding out that those who are on the bottom rung of the economic ladder are working hard but still in poverty. The annual minimum wage is not even keeping up with the poverty line. We are finding more and more workers who are affected by this.

Then, finally, on this phase of the debate, I want to point out the employment figures. We find that we have seen, since the increase in the minimum wage that we passed in 1996 and 1997, there has still been an increase in job growth. This chart shows the increase in 1996, up to $4.75, and then to $5.15. Even with these increases we see new jobs being created and strong economic growth.

All of those on the other side of the aisle who made the predictions that we are going to lose 300,000 to 400,000 jobs if we pass an increase in the minimum wage were wrong. To the contrary, we have seen an expansion of job opportunities. Since the last increase was enacted by Congress, the economy has created new jobs at a rate of 235,000 a month. That addresses, I hope, the economic reasons for not having an increase in the minimum wage.

Let's take a moment and think about who these people are—who are the minimum-wage workers? This has to be enormously distressing to all Americans because there is no group of Americans that is working harder and slipping further behind than women in our society. Almost 60 percent of minimum wage workers are women. 7 million women across the nation—12.6 percent of all working women—would benefit from this increase.

And working fathers are being affected too. We know now that employed fathers with children under 18 work longer hours, averaging 50 hours a week. That is well over the average work time for those tens of millions of Americans who go to work at 40 hours a week, and they get overtime. The average for fathers with children under 18 is 50 hours a week. Fathers' total work time has increased by 3 hours in the past 20 years, and mothers' total work time has increased by 5 hours.

Almost one-half, 45 percent of the workers, report having to work overtime with little or no notice. One in five is asked to work overtime 4 or more days a week, with little or no notice. What does that mean to the families? Here they are working at minimum wage, they may have one job, but they probably two jobs, trying to make ends meet, already working 50 hours a week. Then they are told, without warning, they have to work overtime, which may disrupt their other employment. With the number of hours at each job, especially with the addition of overtime, we are seeing increasing numbers of mothers and fathers forced to spend more and more time away from their children.

According to a 1999 Council of Economic Advisors study, families are suffering. The study says that parents have, on average, experienced a decrease of 22 hours per week available to spend time with their children. That is what this minimum wage is all about—parents having less time to spend with their children. I hope we are not going to hear a lot of speeches out here about the importance of family values by those who vote against this increase. Twenty-two hours per week less—that is what is available for parents to spend time with their children. A decrease has happened and if we really care about families we need to change that.

Another factor, in addition to parents having less time to spend with their children, is the increasing shift work. Shift work is growing fastest in the service sector, which is heavily reliant on women workers. According to the study by Harriet Presser at the University of Maryland, 70 percent of the fastest growing occupations in the United States have a disproportionate number of female employees and require more than 40 percent of their workers to put in nonstandard hours.

Here we are finding out about who is being targeted. It is women. And for what? Nonstandard hours and overtime. At a crucial point in their lives when they are trying to bring up children and be there for them, we find out they are working harder, working longer, and they are making less. Two-thirds of the workers would like to work fewer hours—almost 20 percent more than 5 years ago. But most of those workers believe they can't cut back on hours because they need the money—46 percent. These 20 percent of workers, might be able to work fewer hours if the minimum wage were increased.

Another recent study, ''Working Hard, But Staying Poor,'' notes that working poor are predominantly hourly employees, and 71 percent have little paid vacation; 48 percent have no paid vacation at all—none, none. And 18 percent have a week or less. Madam President, 70 percent of those making the minimum wage have virtually no vacation, or less than a week of paid vacation.

We can't give them an increase of 50 cents an hour? No. Even though we have just voted ourselves $4,600 a year, we are not going to vote for them 50 cents more an hour next year. No. This is what is happening to these families. This is what is happening to these fathers and mothers. This is what is happening to these children. And we say, oh, we can afford $4,600 a year for Members of Congress and the Senate, but we can't do something about mothers and fathers who are increasingly taken away from their children in order to make ends meet.

That is what this issue is about when you come right down to it. We say: Wait a minute here. Where is productivity in all of this? In the last 10 years we have seen a 12-percent increase in productivity for workers in the United States, but only a 1.9 percent pay increase to match. That includes the highest increases by workers in the country, not the minimum wage. That is what has happened, a 1.9-percent increase. We have seen a 29-percent increase in productivity since 1973, and the minimum wage hasn't even kept up with it. What is going on here? No unemployment, no inflation, productivity going up through the roof, and we give ourselves $4,600, and Republicans oppose 50 cents more an hour increase in the minimum wage.

And are Americans really working? There are no workers in the world—none in the world—who are working longer and harder than Americanworkers today. Japan works 54 hours less a year; the Canadians, 215; the British, 221; the French, 314; the Germans, 389. Every other industrial nation in the world is working less.

The Americans, at the lowest end, are working longer and harder trying to make ends meet, with no kinds of health insurance programs, no paid vacations, and they are being jammed with increases in overtime without notification, and they are trying to provide for their children. What happens?

I will tell you what happens. Today, we have the new census figures that are just out, and they are very interesting. The latest census figures show that the percentage of working poor—12.6 percent—is at its highest point in 20 years. That's right, at a time when our country is so strong economically we have the highest number of working poor in 20 years—the highest number of working poor. You can look at those figures and say, well, the median income for lower income families has gone up. OK. I am talking about those individuals who are getting the minimum wage. More of them are working in poverty than at any other time. More of them are working, and working for less, than at any other time. More of them are falling further behind than at any other time.

What do we have to prove? What is there to prove? I can tell you this. If you look back on the movement from welfare to work, you will find that every economist virtually agrees that one of the principal reasons for movement from welfare to work was the increase in the minimum wage. About 700,000 of those moved from welfare to work because of the minimum wage. With this additional increase of a dollar, from every estimate, from 200,000 to 300,000 more will move from welfare to work. They value work. People want to work. They did when we increased it last time and I think they'll do it again.

What does it mean for the taxpayer? It is beneficial to the taxpayer. Why? You will find if you pay more in the minimum wage, you have fewer people who qualify for support programs. That makes sense. Fewer will be qualified for food stamps, fuel assistance programs, and other kinds of support programs. And it will save taxpayers billions of dollars. So it is difficult for me to understand the opposition we are receiving.

In the Democratic proposal, we added a small program, but an important one, that primarily helps working families in the tax program in terms of pensions and some other matters. But we have, on the opposition—and I will come to this later when we will have some time to talk about our Republican friends on the other side—they say don't give them a dollar in the next 2 years; they are not worth it. They are worth a dollar over 3 years, but we are worth $4,600 more a year. We are not going to spread our pay increase out, but we are going to spread out the increase for those at the lowest end of the economic ladder. That is the Republican leadership position.

Now, the American people must wonder what in the world is going on when the Senate and House are trying to get together with the President on this budget, and we are talking about spending Social Security, and we have before us in the Senate a tax break for $75 billion over the next 10 years. Where are we getting all that money? I hope they have given up this argument that, ''Well, look out for the Democrats because they are going to spend Social Security.'' There is $75 billion in the Republican program that is unpaid for.

As I mentioned, I think the compelling reason is the fact that these are men and women who are hard-working. They are child care and health care workers who we entrust with the care of our loved ones every day. They clean out the buildings of American industry and factories every single night.

This is a women's issue because the great majority of the minimum-wage workers are women. It is a children's issue because whether those mothers and fathers are going to make a decent wage is going to affect those children. They worry that they are not going to have warm homes in the winter and enough to eat, which we know they don't have. We know what the Second Harvest reports are about—the number of families working and not making a livable wage are going out to the food pantries all across this country. That is why the mayors—Republican and Democrat alike —support our increase. It is a women's issue, a children's issue, and a civil rights issue because many of these men and women are people of color. And most of all, it is a fairness issue.

How in the world does the Republican leadership go home to their communities and say we voted for a $4,600 pay increase and against your minimum wage?

I hope every citizen will ask their Members of the Senate when we adjourn—whenever that may be, that particular issue is still in question—why a Member's salary is more important than theirs.

Others desire to speak. I see my friend from Minnesota. How much time does he require?

Mr. WELLSTONE. Madam President, I think I will speak for 10 minutes. But I think it will be less because I want the Senator to have a chance to respond to the Republican arguments.

Mr. KENNEDY. The Senator can have 10 minutes.

Mr. WELLSTONE. I thank the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Minnesota is recognized.

Mr. WELLSTONE. Madam President, first of all, let me say in a very personal way that when I was teaching and hoping to become a Senator, this is what I imagined it would be. I could come to the floor of the Senate and support an amendment introduced by Senator KENNEDY, that I would be lucky enough to have Dale Bumpers' desk and be able to sit next to Senator KENNEDY and come out here and fight for what I think is just elementary economic justice. I am very proud to rise to speak in behalf of this amendment.

On behalf of 176,000 Minnesotans who would be helped by this, much less the workers and their children—there would be many more citizens—I thank him. On behalf of another 11 million-plus workers in the country who would benefit from this $1 raise over 2 years, I thank him.

I say to all of my colleagues—Democrats but especially Republicans on the other side of the aisle—wherever I have traveled in our country—I start with my State of Minnesota—no matter where it is in Minnesota, in the city, or in rural areas, or in the suburbs, or whether it is the Deep South, whether it is L.A., East L.A. or Watts, or whether it is, inner-city Baltimore, or whether it is rural Minnesota—the one thing that people come up and say over and over again more than anything else is: We want to be able to have a job at a decent wage so we can support our families, so our children can have the care we know they need and deserve.

When I went to visit the part of the country where my wife Sheila and her family come from, Appalachia, Harlan County, it was the same thing. That is what people want to be able to have —a living-wage job, to be able to earn enough of an income so they can support their children, so they can do right by their children. That is what this amendment is all about. To talk about raising the minimum wage from $5.15 an hour to $6.15 an hour over 2 years so we don't lose what we gained in 1997 is a matter of elementary justice.

I heard Senator KENNEDY say this. I guess I need to emphasize this one or two times myself. I don't know how Senators or Representatives can vote for a $4,600 increase for ourselves when we are already making $130,000-plus a year and say we need this because we have children who are in college and because we need to make sure we have enough money to cover expenses and then turn around and vote against a $1 increase over 2 years from $5.15 an hour to $6.15 an hour.

Our economy is booming. In many ways we are doing well. But the fact is that I still think, using Michael Harrington's term—the Senator from Massachusetts will remember that book—we still have ''two America's.'' We have one America with greater access for all the things that make life richer in possibilities and we have another America that still struggles to make ends meet. Rising tides lift all boats. But in some ways, we haven't been growing together. We have been growing apart.

A minimum-wage worker now makes $5.15 an hour. The average CEO in our country makes $5,100 an hour.

Let me say to every Senator that this is matter of elementary justice. This is, as Senator KENNEDY said, a family value issue. It makes a huge difference, if you are able to make an additional $3,000-plus a year because of this increase in the minimum wage. That means you will be able to pay your utility bills, and you do not have to worry about being shut off. It means your children will be warm as opposed to cold in a cold winter in Minnesota or in Maine, Madam President. It means you will be able to buy clothing for your children. It means you can afford your rent.

I hope and I pray it will mean we will not have so many women and so many children in our homeless shelters with 40 percent of these families having the head of the household working full time—people who work 52 weeks a year, 40 hours a week, and they are still poor in America because they don't make enough of a wage to support themselves and their families.

This is a family value issue. I don't know of any issue before the Senate and I don't know of any debate that we have had in the Senate that speaks more loudly and clearly to family values.

Colleagues, Republicans included, vote for this Kennedy amendment if you want to support your children. Vote for this Kennedy amendment if you want to support families. Vote for this Kennedy amendment if you want to support hard-working people who shouldn't be poor in America. Vote for this amendment if you want to support women. Too many women are the ones who are working full time and still don't make a living wage. This is a matter of justice. There is a matter of family values. This is a matter of doing the right thing. I hope we will have a majority vote for this amendment.

Finally, I will admit it. I will make a blatant political point.

I don't know how in the world anybody in this Chamber can vote a $4,600 salary increase for himself or herself saying we have to have this to make ends meet—and that is from the $130,000 salary at the beginning—and say no, no; we can't vote for people to have the chance to make enough of a wage so they can do a little better for themselves and, more importantly, a little better for their children.

Mr. President, $5.15 an hour to $6.15 an hour, a $1 increase, 50 cents a year over 2 years ought to pass with 100 votes.

I yield the floor.

Mr. KENNEDY. Madam President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Is the Senator familiar with this study by the Family Work Institute? They had an interview with the children of minimum-wage workers. Here are three of the top four things children would like to change about the working parents and the concern about being with their parents. They wish their parents were less stressed out by work, less tired because of work, and could spend more time with them.

The kids are right. The parents have less chance to spend time with them. They are working longer. They are working harder. They have less time to spend with their children. The children are crying out for help, assistance, and for understanding.

This isn't going to solve all of their problems. But this minimum will put $2,000 into the family income, and it would give those parents time to spend with their children, perhaps buy a Christmas present or a birthday present, and permit them to share some additional quality time.

I was wondering if that kind of response from the children of minimum-wage workers surprised the Senator from Minnesota. He has spent a great deal of time traveling this country and talking to needy families.

Mr. WELLSTONE. Madam President, I thank the Senator for his question. I wish I had emphasized that more, I say to the Senator. I can think of so many poignant conversations with people in which they were saying: Given the wages we make, every last hour we can work, we work. We have no other choice because that is the only way we can put food on the table. However, it means we have very little time to spend with our children. It is not what we want. It is not the way we want it to be.

I think this is so important for families.

I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Hawaii is recognized for 7 minutes.

Mr. AKAKA. Mr. President, I rise in support of the amendment to raise the minimum wage.

My colleagues, the case for an increase in the minimum wage is clear. America has enjoyed eight and one-half years of economic expansion. The economic boom that began in March 1999 is now the longest peacetime expansion in American history.

However, the rising tide of economic development has not lifted the boats of millions of American workers. Millions of Americans earning the minimum wage are rapidly becoming a permanent underclass in our society. This amendment is a big step forward for millions who are struggling to feed and raise a family, and rent decent housing, while earning the minimum wage.

At the same time that our economy is expanding, the distribution of income is becoming more and more unequal. As the charts prepared by the Senator from Massachusetts make clear, the earnings of average Americans have grown little, and the overall distribution of income has become increasingly unequal. Whether you examine the trend of U.S. income distribution or compare the wages of U.S. workers to those in other industrialized countries, the result is clear: the wages of the average American worker are stagnating.

While I thank the Senator from Massachusetts for championing this amendment, I am also grateful that his amendment extends the minimum wage to the only U.S. territory where minimum wage is not governed by Federal law. I am speaking of the Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands.

For my colleagues who are not familiar with this territory, the Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands is located 4,000 miles west of Hawaii. In 1975, the people of the CNMI voted for political union with the United States. Today, the CNMI flies the flag of the United States as a U.S. territory.

In 1976, Congress gave U.S. citizenship to residents of the CNMI. At the same time, however, Congress exempted the Commonwealth from the minimum wage provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act. As we now know, that omission was a grave error. Today's amendment will correct that longstanding mistake.

The CNMI section of this amendment stands for the simple proposition that America is one country and that the U.S. minimum wage—whatever amount it may be—should be uniform. Common sense dictates that our country must have a single, national law on minimum wage.

Throughout the United States, Federal law requires that minimum wage workers be paid $5.15 per hour—everywhere, that is, except the Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands. In the CNMI, the minimum wage is $3.15 per hour, 40 percent less than the U.S. minimum wage.

You would have to go back twenty years, to January 1980, to find a time when the statutory minimum wage was that low in the United States. Today, workers in the CNMI are being paid wages that are 20 years behind the times. And the numbers I have cited do not account for the effect of inflation.

Once you adjust the CNMI minimum wage for inflation, you would have to go back to the 1930s—the Depression years—to find a time when the wages of American workers had the same buying power as minimum wage workers in the CNMI today. Adjusted for inflation, the minimum wage in the CNMI—which I remind my colleagues is U.S. soil—is the equivalent of less than ten cents an hour. Ten cents an hour! You can't even buy a pencil for 10 cents. Adjusted for inflation, the minimum wage in this territory is 60 years out of date.

This situation is a disgrace. In Guam, ninety miles from the CNMI, they have been paying the minimum wage since 1950. It's time to end this embarrassment and reform the minimum wage in the Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands. That's one of the important things that this amendment would do.

I yield the floor.

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield 10 minutes to the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I rise as a strong and proud supporter of Senator KENNEDY's amendment to raise theminimum wage one dollar over 2 years. I commend Senator KENNEDY not only for his leadership today but for his attention to the needs of working Americans throughout his career in the Senate.

Today we are debating, and I hope soon adopting, legislation to address an issue vital to America's working families. The amendment before us calls for a 50-cent increase in the minimum wage in January of 2000, with another 50-cent increase in January of 2001. So in a 2-year period we would increase the minimum wage from $5.15 to $6.15.

This minimum wage increase is a necessity for many individuals participating in today's workforce, particularly those moving from welfare to work. Among the rationales behind welfare reform was that everyone who is able to work should work and that a job should offer a sustainable income. Unless we have a living minimum wage, a minimum wage that can support a family, a minimum wage that can allow a family to meet its basic needs, then it is something of a cruel hoax to force people into the workforce, knowing that they will not be able to support themselves on their income alone.

Our economy has been performing remarkably well since the last increase in the minimum wage in 1996. A record 8.7 million jobs have been created. We all recall when we were debating the minimum wage that year, one of the most persistent objections was that the increase would kill job growth; it would prevent our economy from continuing to grow. The reality is that we are in the midst of a period of record economic expansion during which a large number of new jobs have been created.

Increasing the minimum wage is not something that is going to hamper our economy. It will enable working families to provide for their families. Moreover, economic factors dictate that if we don't increase the minimum wage now, the modest growth in inflation will wipe out the gains of the 1996 increase. Indeed, the minimum wage is in danger of dropping below its pre-1996 level in real dollars if we do not pass this amendment.

I believe other economic factors dictate that we increase the minimum wage. As we look at this economy, we are discovering fantastic growth in many quarters, but we also see that the incomes of the poorest Americans are not growing as fast as they have grown in the past.

Between 1950 and 1978, income growth for the lowest earners grew proportionally more than any other income level. What has happened recently, because of our new information society, because of new technology, because of a booming stock market, the wealthiest Americans are increasing their incomes substantially. In fact, the wealthiest one percent of Americans, doubled their incomes between 1977 and 1999. In sharp contrast, the poorest 20 percent of Americans actually saw their incomes fall by 9 percent between 1977 to 1999.

There are some things that we can do to begin to reverse this trend, to ensure that every part of our American family participates in our country's economic success. The first step is to increase the minimum wage.

The reality is that today, workers making the minimum wage—heads of households, single heads of households with a full-time job—earn about $10,700. That is about $2,500 below the poverty level for a family of three. So essentially, what we are telling workers who are going into the workforce with minimum-wage jobs, is that they will not be able to get out of poverty. That I believe is wrong. If someone is going to go into the workforce, work 40 hours a week, and try to raise a family, they should at least be able to make enough money to live above the poverty line.

The other issue that has often been raised with respect to the minimum wage is that, really, this is just a benefit for kids, that kids are the only group of people who have minimum-wage jobs. They are the people working at the fast food restaurants and performing other minimum wage jobs. This is not the truth. Statistics show that 70 percent of minimum-wage earners are adults over 20 years of age. They also show that 46 percent of these minimum-wage workers have full-time jobs and that 59 percent are women.

This correlates closely with the startling statistics we have seen with respect to children and poverty. Frankly, one of the most disturbing statistics is the growth in the number of children living in poverty. Typically, these children are in single-parent households led by women. Since 59 percent of minimum-wage earners are women and 40 percent of minimum-wage earners are the sole breadwinners of their family, these problems seem to be directly connected.

One of the great shames of this Nation, at a time when we are recording robust growth in the stock markets, at a time when we are seeing extraordinary development in our economy, is that one in five children still live in poverty in the United States; that 12 percent of American households cannot meet their basic nutritional needs some part of the year; that 39 percent of the families who turn to food banks for assistance have one adult member who holds a job. These are working Americans, but their wages are so low they cannot feed their families and their children live in poverty. We can do better than this in our great country. The first way to do better is to support this increase in the minimum wage proposed by Senator KENNEDY.

The reality is that having a job today does not mean you are going to be above the poverty level. Having a minimum-wage job frequently guarantees you are below the poverty level. At this time in our history, with such economic progress, with the vista of a new century before us, with the information age bursting upon us, we should be able to guarantee if a person works 40 hours a week, that person should be able to raise a family above the poverty level.

This proposal for a minimum wage seems only to be controversial here in the Senate. If you go back to Rhode Island and ask people what they think, they think the minimum wage should go up. They recognize and understand how hard it is to support their own families. They know if they had a minimum-wage job, it would be close to impossible to do that.

Indeed, there was a survey done by the Jerome Levy Economic Institute which showed that 87 percent of small businesses thatwere contacted and asked about increasing the minimum wage thought that they could absorb this modest cost. That is up from 79 percent just a year ago. So even small business believes raising the minimum wage is appropriate. That might be a direct reflection of the fact that many states have already raised the minimum wage above the federal level. Indeed, in many parts of the country with the highest minimum wages, there is a persistent shortage of labor. In fact, businesses are bidding for workers at levels above the minimum wage.

We are really talking about protecting the most vulnerable workers in our economy, those without the power to negotiate higher wages, those in areas of economic activity that do not require high skill levels, and therefore can be easily replaced. These are the people for whom we should have a special concern, these are the people we should help move up out of poverty, not by a handout but by simply rewarding the value of each hour they work.

Business Week, a magazine that is not traditionally a strong proponent of prolabor sentiments, had this to say:

It is time to set aside the old assumptions about the minimum wage. . . . We don't know how high the minimum wage can rise until it hurts the demand for labor. But with the real minimum wage no higher than it was under President Reagan, we can afford to take prudent risks.

Frankly, this is not a risk, it is a prudent investment in the workers of America. My own paper, the Providence Journal, adds:

An increase to $6.15 would help take a nick out of poverty and provide a more solid base for . . . economic expansion. Congress ought to do it.

I ask unanimous consent to have this Providence Journal editorial printed at the conclusion of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See exhibit 1.)

Mr. REED. I agree with the Providence Journal. It is about time Congress acted. It is about time we took a nick out of poverty. It is about time we invested in working families and gave them, through their own efforts, theresources to raise their families, to raise them up out of poverty. We must give new hope to families who are working very hard in this economy to raise children, to move forward and seize the opportunity at the heart of the American dream.

I again commend Senator KENNEDY for his great efforts, not just today, but for so many days on the floor, fighting for working families, fighting for economic justice for all our citizens.

I yield the floor.

EXHIBIT 1

RAISE THE MINIMUM WAGE

A proposal in Congress to raise the minimum wage, now $5.15 an hour, by two increments of 50 cents each over the next two years seems reasonable. This would still leave those subsisting on these wages well below the federal poverty level, but it would at least bring them some modest relief. (The debate comes, by the way, as Congress voted itself an average $4,600 raise.)

The argument is sometimes made that to raise the minimum wage would reduce employment by raising employers' costs. We see little indication over the past few years that the move would shrink employment. For that matter, increasing the minimum wage, by widening purchasing power, could substantially help the economy and boost employment over the long run.

It should also be noted that higher wages often mean greater loyalty and effort on the part of employees. Thus, whatever the increment of a higher minimum wage, that costs could be more than offset by higher revenue and profits from increased productivity and reduced turnover, hiring and training costs.

It is interesting that in many states with the highest state minimum wages, such as Massachusetts (now at $5.25 and to be raised to $6.75 in two 75-cent increments over the next two years), there are serious labor shortages. Recent increases in those states' minimum wages have not brought about price rises or layoffs, so far as such things can be measured.

But then, consider that the purchasing power of the current minimum wage is about $2 less that of the minimum wage in 1968 (when the jobless rate was also very low). Further, it should be noted that more than 70 percent of American workers receiving the minimum wage are over age 25 or not longer in school.

An increase to $6.15 would help take a nick out of poverty and provide a more solid base for the economic expansion. Congress ought to do it.

Mr. KENNEDY. Madam President, I see the Senator from North Dakota on the floor. I yield him 7 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota is recognized for 7 minutes.

Mr. DORGAN. Madam President, we are here debating the question of the minimum wage: Should the minimum wage be increased? We are talking about people at the bottom of the economic ladder in this country, people who work hard, who do not ask for much. They do not have stock in the stock market. They have not, by and large, been blessed with substantial increases in income by a growing economy. In many cases, they have been losing ground.

I know when we talk about the minimum wage, we tend to talk about it in terms of statistics, tables and charts. I have met repeatedly over the years with people who have had difficulty, who are trying to get back into the labor market, who are working at minimum-wage jobs. I recall one such meeting in my office in Fargo, ND, with probably a half dozen young women who were struggling to get off the welfare roll and get on a payroll and earn a living, to get some training and move into the job force again.

All of them told me the same story of the difficulty of making ends meet on a minimum wage paycheck. They shared with me how hard it was to balance a checkbook on minimum wage—meeting the monthly bills like child care, rent, a car payment, let alone trying to find a few dollars to buy a Christmas present for the kids.

The story is always the same. Those stories come to you from people who are trying very hard. Most of them tell those stories with tears in their eyes. It is the case here in Congress that the halls are not full today of interest groups who are well organized, who have hired some very skilled people to lobby on their behalf for this kind of legislative change. For people at the lower end of the economic ladder, there are not halls full of well-paid lobbyists and others pushing for this change. They are largely the voiceless in our society who do not have the capability to influence legislative events quite as easily as some other very important interests in this country do. But that should not persuade anybody that this interest is not important.

It is very important for our country, especially in a circumstance where the economy is growing. All the signs are that our country is doing well. The stock market is doing very well. Unemployment is at a 30 year low.

It is important for us also to understand there are families struggling on minimum wage trying to make ends meet. The fact is, the purchasing power value of that minimum wage has diminished dramatically. It is about $2.50 below the purchasing power value in 1968.

None of us in this room are working for minimum wage. No one. So none of us have experienced what it is like to put in 40 or 45 hours this week and be paid minimum wage and then try to make a car payment, pay rent, buy food for the kids, and make ends meet. We cannot do that. No one in this Chamber would volunteer to do that, I expect. But there are a lot of people trying to do that because they want to pay their way. They want a decent job; they want an opportunity. They want to work.

That is why it is important in this circumstance for us to increase the minimum wage. Its purchasing power diminishes over time because of inflation. The value of the minimum wage has decreased for a lot of these families. Many of us know that poverty in this country is increasingly poverty of a single woman trying to raise a family. Many of us have met with those folks in our offices and elsewhere telling us the difficulties they are having.

In many ways, it is hopeful that both sides of the political aisle in this Chamber are talking about increasing the minimum wage. This is an important subject. We are both talking about this subject now in a serious way, and that is good. It ought to give hope to those at the bottom of the economic ladder who are trying very hard to make ends meet and have difficulty doing it on today's minimum wage.

There is a difference between the proposals. The minimum wage we are proposing will provide a minimum wage increase on January 1, 2000. The alternative plan will not.

We provide a $1 increase in the minimum wage over 2 years. The GOP plan does not.

We protect overtime compensation for 73 million working Americans who are entitled to it. The GOP does not.

We offset the full cost of the tax cuts, and there are some tax incentives and cuts in this proposal to help businesses that will confront some additional costs. We fully offset ours. The competing plan is mostly unpaid for.

We can go on down the list. We extend the welfare-to-work credit. The other plan does not.

We provide a work-site child care tax credit. The GOP plan does not.

We provide wage tax credits for small businesses located in the empowerment zone which, incidentally, is very important in our part of the country. These are zones, especially the empowerment zone in my State, which have as a criteria the outmigration of people. People who have left. This is not unemployment and poverty. That is one sign of economic distress. The other sign is a rural county that has lost half its population. People cannot find work, so they leave, and the county shrinks like a prune.

Empowerment zones create jobs and restore economic vitality and health in those areas. We include that in our proposal, but the GOP plan does not.

These are interesting and important differences between the two plans. I say this: At least we are on the right subject.

The Senator from Massachusetts has worked tirelessly on behalf of those at the bottom of the economic ladder who are struggling hard and valiantly trying to make ends meet. By proposing this minimum wage increase which, in my judgment, is long overdue, the Senator from Massachusetts does a real service. I hope at the end of this debate we will be able to adopt the Senator's amendment, and I hope those who are working on minimum wage struggling to care for their families and create a future for themselves, on January 1 will be able to say: Yes, Congress did something that will help me and my family as well.

Madam President, I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. KENNEDY. Madam President, I understand I have 8 minutes remaining.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. KENNEDY. The Senator from Virginia asked for 10 minutes. I ask unanimous consent that I have 2 additional minutes and yield 10 minutes to him.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered. The Senator from Virginia is recognized.

Mr. ROBB. Madam President, on Friday, November 5, Senator BAUCUS and I introduced the Small Business Tax Reduction Act of 1999. We drafted this legislation to complement Senator KENNEDY's minimum wage amendment, and under the unanimous consent agreement, it was incorporated into that amendment which is now pending.

The Small Business Tax Reduction Act of 1999 is targeted to provide tax relief for those employers who will be most affected by the minimum wage increase, even more than the proposal to be offered by the other side of the aisle.

Our package adheres to two principles that had to be reconciled: First, that tax relief should be provided to those who need it most; and, second, that any tax relief package be fiscally responsible.

To make sure that our package benefited those who need it most, we focused primarily on small businesses, those most likely to experience higher costs as a result of an increased minimum wage.

To make sure the package was fiscally responsible, we used true offsets, not the surplus, to pay for it. In this way, we have remained true to both principles: This is a good tax package; it is a responsible tax package.

Admittedly, deciding what provisions to include in such a bill required some compromises. In almost all cases, I have sponsored, or cosponsored, legislation that would go beyond the tax relief in many of the areas addressed by our bill. I will continue my efforts to move on these broader provisions.

However, our commitment to paying for the tax bill and not either borrowing from our parents by using the Social Security trust fund or borrowing from our children by increasing our debt burden, precluded us from doing more at this time.

In some respects, our tax package is similar to the Republican proposal. For example, both packages accelerate the 100-percent deduction for self-employed health insurance; both packages increase section 179 expensing for small businesses; both packages extend the work opportunity tax credit; and both packages raise the business meals deduction from 50 percent to 60 percent.

But in other ways, our packages are quite different. For instance, we have included in our amendment some estate tax relief for small family-owned farms and businesses. Inflation has left the current exemption simply insufficient to give adequate relief to farmers and small business owners. This is one of the areas where we clearly need to do more, but some relief is better than none.

We have included provisions targeted to geographic areas with the greatest need for economic assistance. The new markets proposal, for example, would reward employers who operate in economically distressed areas where the minimum wage is the most prevalent.

There is also a credit that encourages employers to give lower income employees information technology training so we can begin to close the so-called digital divide. I was at an announcement this morning that will also make a major step in that direction.

We also expand current empowerment zone credits so more communities and more people are able to take advantage of these credits. The empowerment zone credit provides a dual benefit. It helps those who may not yet be reaping the benefits of our expanding economy, and it helps revitalize our cities which, over the long term, may be our best tool for reducing the pressures that lead to suburban sprawl.

Another area we devoted our attention to is retirement security. Increasingly, people are apprehensive about their retirement. Many small businesses are struggling to provide retirement security for their employees.

The pension provisions in our bill are designed to address the needs of these small employers who are trying to develop effective retirement plans for their employees.

For example, we would allow small businesses to borrow from their plans, just as large businesses can, and we have included Senator BAUCUS' proposal to provide a credit for new small business pension plans. Everyone benefits when small businesses are better able to offer their employees retirement plans.

Finally, we need to help our communities meet their increasing demand for new and upgraded schools. Across the Nation, there are pent-up needs for new schools to make room for smaller classes, for schools that have access to the latest technology, for schools that have decent heating and plumbing and leak-proof roofs.

To help meet those needs, we have included a provision to help communities modernize their public schools. In this bill, we propose extending the Qualified Zone Academy Bond Program, or QZABs, for an additional year. This program helps with school modernization efforts and deserves to be extended.

Again, this effort is important, but we need to do much more. While we could not squeeze more on school construction into this vehicle, I am determined to find one that is large enough to accommodate our Nation's schoolchildren, who, frankly, deserve better than what they have gotten from Congress this year.

Let me close by reiterating why we decided to pay for this bill and not just take the money from the surplus.

First of all, I believe both sides understand we made a bipartisan commitment to stop dipping into the Social Security surplus to pay for current spending outside Social Security. Honoring this commitment is important both to maintain pressure for fiscal discipline and to prevent further cynicism about the way the Federal Government operates.

As for the non-Social Security surplus, we believe our first priority should be paying down the over $5 trillion debt we have accumulated by failing to exercise fiscal discipline in the past. The need to keep up the pressure for fiscal responsibility is clear.

Congress has been breaking the spending caps at breakneck speed. CBO recently advised us, not only had we already spent the small surplus expected for fiscal year 2000, we are already $17 billion in the red for the next fiscal year. Until we can agree on a comprehensive package that balances our spending, tax relief, and debt reduction priorities, we should pay for the spending and the tax cutting we propose and not take the easy route of spending the surpluses that may or may not actually materialize.

If we do not put the brakes on piecemeal tax cuts now, we could easily face a runaway train of politically popular proposals that are not likely to be in the best long-term interests of the Nation. When we are ready to put everything on the table and consider the various priorities—such as using the surplus to pay down the debt—we can engage in that discussion. Until then, we should focus on achieving the current objective, which is to assist employers, particularly small employers, who may be adversely affected by the minimum wage increase.

In short, this tax package accomplishes its purpose of providing relief to those employers who are most likely to have higher costs when the minimum wage increases. It is responsible. It does not squander the surplus we have fought so hard to achieve but maintains it for debt reduction. At the same time, it protects Social Security trust funds from being misallocated to other programs and expenditures. This is a good tax package, and I urge our colleagues to support it.

With that, Madam President, I reserve any time remaining and yield the floor.

Mr. KENNEDY. Madam President, I suggest the absence of a quorum and ask unanimous consent that it not be charged to either side.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative assistant proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DOMENICI. Madam President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DOMENICI. Madam President, parliamentary inquiry. Could the Chair tell me, is it now appropriate for me to call up the amendment that is pending that has been filed with reference to an alternative minimum wage and tax plan?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senator yields back the remaining time on the Kennedy amendment, the answer is yes.

Mr. DOMENICI. Parliamentary inquiry. How much time do we have on the Kennedy amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There are 60 minutes remaining.

Mr. DOMENICI. In the event I do not yield that back, what is the remaining time arrangement for the day and for tomorrow on the two respective amendments, the Kennedy amendment and the Domenici amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. After the 60 minutes of remaining debate on the Kennedy amendment is used, there would be a period of 2 hours for debating the amendment which the Senator would be proposing.

Mr. DOMENICI. Then what is the agreed-upon schedule for tomorrow with reference to the amendments?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is 1 hour of debate beginning at 9:30, with a vote scheduled to occur at 10:30.

Mr. DOMENICI. Madam President, might I ask Senator KENNEDY a question?

Mr. KENNEDY. Please.

Mr. DOMENICI. I ask Senator KENNEDY, I understand you have no additional speakers now.

Mr. KENNEDY. If I could answer the Senator, I think we do actually have some additional speakers. They can either do it now or at some other appropriate time after all the time has expired.

Mr. DOMENICI. I understand that as far as today's debate is concerned, you are out of time.

Is that what the Parliamentarian told me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct, that the time controlled by Senator KENNEDY on the Kennedy amendment has expired. Sixty minutes remain for those opposing the Kennedy amendment.

Mr. KENNEDY. But, I say to the Senator, as I understand it, when you offer your amendment, you will have 60 minutes and we will have 60 minutes. I think we could accommodate the other Senators. Senator FEINSTEIN is here. We have probably two other Senators. We can let them speak at that particular time. So it is just a question of working out the remaining time this evening.

Mr. DOMENICI. I yield back any time we have in opposition to the——

Mr. NICKLES. No.

Mr. DOMENICI. Excuse me.

Madam President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative assistant proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. NICKLES. Madam President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. NICKLES. Madam President, as I understand the parliamentary situation, we have 2 hours equally divided: One on the Kennedy amendment, and the other 2 hours on an amendment that will be offered by Senator DOMENICI.

I wish to speak very briefly in opposition to the Kennedy amendment. Then I will yield back the time, and that will eliminate at least that round. Then there will be 2 hours equally divided on the Domenici amendment. People can speak on either proposal, as they wish.

For the information of our colleagues, we will have one hour of debate tomorrow morning and a vote at 10:30 on both proposals.

I urge my colleagues to vote no on the so-called Kennedy minimum wage proposal that is now before the Senate. I compliment my colleague from Massachusetts. He has offered this time and time again. I am sure he will be back next year and the following year to increase the minimum wage. If you ask the question: should there be an increase in the minimum wage, I am sure a lot of people would say yes because they want everybody who is making a low wage to make more.

I happen to agree with that very strongly. It is very important for people to be able to climb the economic ladder. What people many times don't recognize is that if you have a very significant increase in the minimum wage—such as Senator KENNEDY's proposal of approximately a 20-percent increase, increasing it from $5.15 to $6.15, a $1 over the next 13½ months. That is OK, I suppose, if everybody can just pass it along without any repercussions. But there may be some businesses that can't. If they can't, what are they going to do? They may hire less people. They may let some people go.

I know it does not seem as if that would be the case, but frankly it is. It may not happen in every case, but it happens in many cases. There are some employers that may not be able to pay $5.15 an hour or $6 an hour. Senator KENNEDY's proposal says in 13½ months you have to be paid $6.15 an hour or it is against the law for you to have a job.

The Federal Government has determined that, in our infinite wisdom, in rural Montana or where ever, we don't care if pumping gas can only pay $5.50 or the corner grocery store can only afford to pay that amount, we don't care. We are deciding up here in Washington DC, that the Federal Government does not want you to have a job. It is against the law for you to have a job. The Federal Government has decided employers must pay at lease $6.15 an hour or they cannot hire anyone. Sorry, 15-year-old, 16-year-old, or 17-year-old trying to get a summer job, if there are no summer jobs available at that amount. It may be fine for the State of Massachusetts. That may be great in New York City. I can't help but think there are some areas of the country where maybe that does not apply and will not work.

This idea that raising the minimum wage can only have a positive economic impact is grossly incorrect. The Congressional Budget Office has stated it would mean a job loss of between 100,000 and 500,000 jobs. That is a pretty significant hit. Maybe it is not a hit for everybody because we have millions of people working, but for between 100,000, and 400,000 people who could lose their jobs, that is pretty significant. If they find themselves unemployed because they couldn't get a job as a result of the minimum wage increase we have created a real injustice. Maybe they are looking for summer work, maybe they are looking for part-time work, or maybe they are trying to supplement a job working evenings. Why should we price them out of the market?

Let me address a few other things that are in Senator KENNEDY's proposal. There are some tax cuts. Senator ROBB just spoke regarding those. Many of those are similar to ones we have in our package that Senator DOMENICI will be talking about briefly. I compliment them on those tax cuts. What I criticize them for are the tax increases. You didn't know they had a lot of tax increases in the Democrat proposal? Well, they do. The fact is, there are more tax increases than there are tax cuts.

What tax increases do they have? They have two or three things. They have a little provision in here that reauthorizes Superfund taxes. We do not reauthorize Superfund because the program is flawed. Does it make sense that they are going to extend Superfund taxes without fixing the program? I am absolutely confident, 100 percent confident this Congress is not going to reauthorize and extend Superfund taxes unless we reauthorize the program. The program is broken. We are raising billions of dollars or have raised billions of dollars and we are wasting it.

The lawyers and trial attorneys reap great benefits, but we spend very little money cleaning up the program. Many of us are in favor of fixing the program. Let's make sure 90 percent of the money that is raised for Superfund cleanup actually goes to cleanup, rather than the current situation in which two-thirds of it goes to legal fees.

The Kennedy legislation also includes several other tax increases. There is a proposal that goes by the name of the Doggett proposal. According to a lot of different groups—including the Cattlemen's Association, Taxpayers Union, U.S. Chamber of Commerce, and National Federation of Independent Businesses—this is a really big, bad tax increase. It is called the Abusive Tax Shelter Shutdown Act of 1998.

Most people think of it simply as an IRS enhancement act. Well, they are quite mistaken. I mean, should we really give the IRS a blank check to go after lots of people for a lot of things because we think maybe we will disallow noneconomic tax attributes, whatever that means. It is essentially a $10 billion tax increase and we are going to turn the IRS loose.

We spent a lot of time and passed, in a bipartisan fashion—my compliments to Senators ROTH and MOYNIHAN—last year a very significant IRS reform bill that curbed the appetite of the IRS. This legislation would say, forget about those reforms. It would give the IRS more power to go after what they consider noneconomic attributes. It is truly a bad idea.

There are a lot of bad proposals within the Kennedy language. There are tax increases and the tax increases won't work. The tax increases will extend taxes that shouldn't be extended until the programs are reauthorized.

It is a heavy hit, particularly on small business, too quick, too much, too early. A 20-percent increase in the next 13 and a half months, in my opinion, is too much. It would have economic ramifications that would cause many people to lose their jobs. How many? Hundreds of thousands. According to CBO, it says job loss would be between 100,000 and 500,000.

I ask unanimous consent that this conclusion of the CBO be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CONGRESSIONAL BUDGET OFFICE PRIVATE-SECTOR MANDATE STATEMENT

S. 1805—Fair Minimum Wage Act of 1998

Summary: S. 1805 would amend the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 (FLSA) to increase the minimum wage rate under the Act from $5.15 per hour to $5.65 per hour on January 1, 1999, and to $6.15 per hour on January 1, 2000.

Private-sector mandates contained in bill: S. 1805 contains a mandate on private-sector employers covered by the FLSA. It would require those employers to pay a higher minimum wage rate than they are required to pay under current law.

Estimated direct cost to the private sector: CBO's estimate of the direct cost of the private-sector mandate in S. 1805 is displayed in the following table.

DIRECT COST OF PRIVATE-SECTOR MANDATE

[In billions of dollars]

Provision	Fiscal years—
	1999	2000	2001	2002	2003
Increase the minimum wage rate	2.7	7.4	7.9	7.0	6.2

Basis of the estimate: S. 1805 specifies that the minimum wage is to increase from $5.15 to $5.65 per hour on January 1, 1999, and to $6.15 on January 1, 2000. Other sections of the FLSA providing different rules for certain workers and employers, including the provision permitting employers to pay teenagers $4.25 per hour during the first 90 consecutive days of employment, would not change.

To estimate the direct cost to private employers, information was used on the number of workers whose wages would be affected in January 1999 and subsequent months, the wage rates these workers would receive in the absence of the enactment of the proposal, and the number of hours for which they would be compensated.

The estimate was made in two steps. CBO used data from the Current Population Survey (CPS) to estimate how much it would have cost employers to comply with the mandate had they been required to do so in early 1998. Second, these estimates were then used to project the costs to employers beginning in January 1999, taking into account the expected decline in the number of workers in the relevant wage range. The remainder of this section discusses the way this estimate was constructed and limitations of the data and methods.

The methods used for this estimate are similar to those used for CBO's estimates of proposals made in 1996, the most recent year in which bills to increase the federal minimum wage rate were considered on the floor of the Senate and the House. Unlike in 1996, CBO only has information about the number of workers in the relevant wage range for a very short time period since the current minimum wage rate became effective. In preparing the estimates in 1996, CBO was able to use data from several years when the minimum wage was at the then-existing rate of $4.25 per hour. The current rate of $5.15 per hour was implemented in September 1997. As more information becomes available, this estimate might need to be revised.

Estimates from the current population survey

Data on hourly wage rates contained in the January 1998 CPS provide CBO's estimate of the number of private-sector workers in that month who were paid in the relevant wage. At that time, about 2.2 million workers in the private sector were paid exactly $5.15 per hour and an additional 9.5 million workers were paid between $5.16 and $6.14 per hour. (About 1.5 million additional workers reported being paid $5.00 per hour; as discussed below, it is assumed that these workers were also covered by the $5.15 minimum wage and were misreporting their wage rates.) Roughly one-quarter of the workers in the relevant wage range were teenagers. Based on information from the Bureau of Labor Statistics, it is assumed that about 30 percent of those teenagers were in their first 90 days of employment with their current employer and therefore not covered by the increase in the minimum wage.[1]

CBO estimates that if the workers in the private sector who had been paid between $5.00 and $5.64 per hour in January 1998 had been paid $5.65 instead (with no change in the number of hours worked), their employers would have paid them approximately $300 million in additional wages in that month. If the workers who had been paid between $5.00 and $6.14 had been paid $6.15, their employers would have incurred an additional wage bill of about $900 million in that month. Moreover, employers would have had to pay the employers' share of the payroll taxes on those additional wages; these taxes are included in CBO's estimate of the total direct cost of the mandate.

Applying the estimates from the CPS to the projection period

The monthly cost to employers of the proposed increases in the minimum wage would be smaller in the future because the number of workers in the affected range will decline. For example, during the eight-year period starting in 1981 when the minimum wage remained at $3.35 per hour, the number of workers paid exactly that rate declined from 4.2 million to 1.8 million, as market forces and increases in state minimum wage rates raised the level of wages paid. In 1996, CBO used data from the March 1992 and March 1995 CPS to estimate that the cost of complying with a minimum wage of $5.15 per hour would have fallen by almost 40 percent over this three-year period, or about one percent per month.

CBO assumes that the direct mandate cost would continue to decrease at this rate throughout the projection period. Thus, the monthly cost of raising the minimum wage to $5.65 in January 1999 would be roughly 87 percent of the cost estimated using the January 1998 data. The estimated cost of raising the minimum wage to $6.15 in January 2000 would be about 79 percent of the cost of doing so in January 1998.

Estimates for each fiscal year were then made by aggregating the monthly costs. The estimate for fiscal year 1999 is the smallest because that period only includes an increased minimum wage for nine months. The estimate for 2000 includes the cost of a $5.65 minimum wage for three months and a $6.15 minimum wage for nine months. The estimate of the direct cost to the private sector is highest for 2001, when all twelve months would be at $6.15 per hour.

Limitations

Estimates of the direct cost of this mandate are uncertain for at least two reasons. First, the main source of data—the January 1998 CPS—is subject to sampling error and other problems when used for this purpose. For example, CBO assumed that the workers who reported being paid $5.00 per hour after the minimum wage had risen to $5.15 were actually earning $5.15 because there is no evidence that compliance with the Fair Labor Standards Act fell.[2] The wage rates of other low-wage workers—some of the workers who reported being paid below $5.00 per hour and some of the workers not paid on an hourly basis—would also be affected by an increase in the statutory minimum.[3] Second, there is no solid basis for projecting the future number of workers who would have wage rates in the relevant range, their precise wage rates, nor the number of hours they would work under current law. The annual decline estimated from the 1992–1995 period could turn out to be too rapid or too slow.

Indirect effects of an increase in the minimum wage: An increase in the minimum wage rate from $5.15 to $6.15 would require employers to raise the wages paid to the lowest-paid workers covered by the FLSA by 19 percent, and would require employers to raise the wages of workers in the range between the old and the new statutory rates by smaller amounts. As under current law, employers could still pay teenage workers $4.25 per hour during their first 90 calendar days.

Economists have devoted considerable energy to the task of estimating how employers would respond to such a mandate. Although most economists would agree that an increase in the minimum wage rate would cause firms to employ fewer low-wage workers (or employ them for fewer hours), there is considerable disagreement about the magnitude of the reduction. It has proven difficult to isolate the effects of past changes in the minimum wage. Moreover, the estimates from such analysts are hard to apply to future changes.

Based on CBO's review of a number of these studies, a plausible range of estimates for illustrating the potential losses is that a 10 percent increase in the minimum wage would resulting a 0.5 percent to 2 percent reduction in the employment level of teenagers and a smaller percentage reduction for young adults (ages 20 to 24).[4] These estimates would produce employment losses for an increase in the minimum wage of the extent provided in this bill of roughly 100,000 to 500,000 jobs. The individuals whose employment opportunities would be reduced are likely to include the lest-skilled job-seekers who might benefit most from the work experience.

This range of employment impacts is the same as CBO estimated two years ago when Congress was considering a 21 percent ($0.90 per hour) increase in the minimum wage.[5] At that time, the low end of the range seemed more realistic because the number of workers in the relevant wage range and the size of the minimum wage relative to the average wage were relatively low. This time, however, those special considerations do not apply because less time has elapsed since the most recent increase in the minimum wage. About 50 percent more workers are in the affected wage range now than were in the relevant wage range when the 1996 legislation was being considered. Likewise, the minimum wage is currently about 41 percent of the average hourly earnings of production or nonsupervisory workers in the private sector, compared with about 36 percent just before the 1996 legislation was enacted.

But two additional differences from the situation that existed in 1996 could reduce employment impacts. First, the labor market is exceptionally tight, with the total unemployment rate at 4.6 percent and the teenage unemployment rate at 14.7 percent (February 1998). In 1996, the total unemployment rate was nearly one point higher and the teenage unemployment rate was two points higher. Second, the most recent increase in the minimum wage amended the FLSA to permit employers to pay teenagers $4.25 per hour for the first 90 days, and the current bill would not change this provision. The literature on which the estimates reported above are based did not reflect such a differential. Presumably, the differential could result in fewer employment losses for teenagers, more losses for adults, and fewer losses overall. Although recent data indicate that few employers are using the option, its availability could cushion employment losses if labor markets weakened.

In addition to its effect on employment levels, an increase in the minimum wage could have many other economic impacts. For example, one consequence that has received considerable attention is its potential effects on the earnings of low-wage workers. CBO estimates that the direct effect of the proposed increase would be to increase the aggregate earnings of workers who would otherwise have received between $5.15 and $6.14 per hour by over $7 billion in 2001. An indirect effect of the increase in the minimum wage might be that employers would also voluntarily raise the wage rates of workers who were already being paid just above the new rate in order to maintain differentials (the ''spillover effect'').

Previous CBO estimate: On March 3, 1998, CBO issued an estimate of S. 1573, which would increase the minimum wage rate in three annual steps to $6.65 per hour and then would adjust the minimum wage thereafter to reflect changes in the Consumer Price Index. The current estimate of the direct cost to the private sector is based on the same methodology.

[2] Staff within the Department of Labor's Employment Standards Administration, the agency responsible for enforcing the FLSA, report no increase in the number of complaints filed since the minimum wage increased to $5.15.

[3] In January 1998, there were almost 2 million workers who reported being paid an hourly wage rate of less than $5.00. Some workers, such as employees in retail firms whose gross volume of sales is less than $500,000 are not covered by the minimum wage, while others, such as certain tipped workers, are covered but can be paid a lower wage rate.

[5] On March 25, 1996, CBO provided an estimate of the cost to the private sector of S. 413, which would have increased the minimum wage rate in two annual steps, from $4.25 per hour to $5.15 per hour. That bill did not include the youth differential and other special provisions that were contained in the legislation enacted later that year.

Mr. NICKLES. I say that 100,000 to 500,000 lost jobs is too heavy a penalty. For that one person who might lose his or her job, it is a very heavy penalty. According to the Federal Reserve Bank of San Francisco, there would be from 145,000 to 436,000 lost jobs. These are independent studies, not branches of a Don Nickles study group that says this is a bad idea. The CBO and Federal Reserve state that this will cost hundreds of thousands of jobs.

If there is no job loss or negative economic consequence, why stop at $6.15 an hour? Why don't we make it $20 an hour? I want everybody in America to make $20 an hour. I do. If they work 2,000 hours a year, that is an average of 40 hours a week for 50 weeks. If everybody made $20 an hour, hey, that would be great. That would be $40,000. I would love for everybody in America to make $40,000. But guess what. Some jobs might not pay that.

Does it make good economic sense to pass a law to say it is against the law for somebody to work for $40,000? I don't think so. Whether it would mean the loss of 100,000 jobs or 500,000 jobs, I don't know. But, I don't want to put even 100,000 people out of work. I don't want to discourage any young person or any person at all from trying to climb the economic ladder. We pulled it up. Sorry. We would rather have you unemployed than have you climbing the economic ladder.

I think that is a huge mistake. I think this proposal is too big of a hit, too quickly. I think the tax increase in the Democrat proposal is completely unworkable and it is certainly unfair.

The other side might claim that they paid for their tax cuts, and that Senator DOMENICI will have a proposal to benefit small business, and he didn't pay for his because it comes out of the surplus.

I disagree, especially when we are looking at having significant surpluses in the next 10 years. Basically what our Democrat colleagues are saying is: We want no tax cut whatsoever.

Less than 2 months ago, they voted for a $300 billion tax cut that was not paid for. Now they are saying we have to pay for this; even if it is only $18 billion over 5 years, we have to pay for every dime of it so we have more money to spend.

I urge my colleagues to vote ''no'' on the Kennedy proposal.

I understand Senator KENNEDY and his side have used their hour. If there is no objection, I will yield back the remainder of the time in opposition to the Kennedy amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time has been yielded back on the Kennedy amendment.

The Senator from New Mexico is recognized.

Mr. DOMENICI. Madam President, I have no objection to yielding to the Senator from California to speak in favor of the Kennedy amendment if she would tell me how long she wishes to speak.

Mrs. FEINSTEIN. Probably 10 to 15 minutes. I can certainly wait.

Mr. DOMENICI. They would be using that off the opposition time to the Domenici amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The second amendment would have to be called up.

AMENDMENT NO. 2547

(Purpose: To increase the Federal minimum wage and protect small business)

Mr. DOMENICI. Madam President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The legislative assistant read as follows:

The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. DOMENICI], for himself, Mr. ABRAHAM, and Mr. SANTORUM, proposes an amendment numbered 2547.

Mr. DOMENICI. Madam President, I ask unanimous consent that reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(The text of the amendment is printed in today's RECORD under ''Amendments Submitted.'')

Mr. DOMENICI. Madam President, I yield the floor at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California is recognized.

UNANIMOUS-CONSENT AGREEMENT

Mrs. FEINSTEIN. Madam President, I ask unanimous consent to temporarily lay aside the pending amendment so I might send to the desk two amendments and then lay them aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent request of the Senator from California?

Mr. NICKLES. I didn't hear the request. Will the Senator repeat it.

Mrs. FEINSTEIN. Certainly. It is a unanimous-consent request so I might call up and then lay aside two amendments.

Mr. DOMENICI. What are they related to?

Mrs. FEINSTEIN. To the bankruptcy bill.

Mr. DOMENICI. Madam President, is that inconsistent with any order we have entered at this point?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is not inconsistent with any order that has been entered into.

Mr. NICKLES. Reserving the right to object——

Mrs. FEINSTEIN. I am going to call them up and lay them aside.

Mr. NICKLES. Madam President, parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state his inquiry.

Mr. NICKLES. Under the unanimous-consent request we have entered into, there were three nongermane amendments basically offered by Democrats and Republicans; is that correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. NICKLES. We also stated under the unanimous-consent agreement that all other amendments had to be relevant to the bankruptcy bill; is that correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. NICKLES. Might I ask my colleague, are the two amendments she is trying to offer right now germane to the bankruptcy bill?

Mrs. FEINSTEIN. Yes, they are.

Mr. NICKLES. Might I inquire what they deal with?

Mrs. FEINSTEIN. One is amendment No. 1697, to place a $1,500 limit on credit to minors, unless they have independent proof of income or the card is cosigned signed by a parent or legal guardian. The second is amendment No. 2755, directing the Federal Reserve Board to conduct a study of credit industry lending practices.

Mr. NICKLES. Madam President, I have no objection.

AMENDMENTS NOS. 1696 AND 2755, EN BLOC

Mrs. FEINSTEIN. Madam President, I send two amendments to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from California [Mrs. FEINSTEIN] proposes amendments numbered 1696 and 2755, en bloc.

Mrs. FEINSTEIN. Madam President, I ask unanimous consent that reading of the amendments be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendments are as follows:

AMENDMENT NO. 1696

(Purpose: To limit the amount of credit extended under an open end consumer credit plan to persons under the age of 21, and for other purposes)

At the appropriate place, insert the following:

SEC. ___. ISSUANCE OF CREDIT CARDS TO UNDERAGE CONSUMERS.

(2) by inserting after paragraph (4) the following:

''(5) APPLICATIONS FROM UNDERAGE OBLIGORS.—

''(A) PROHIBITION ON ISSUANCE.—Except in response to a written request or application to the card issuer that meets the requirements of subparagraph (B), a card issuer may not—

''(i) issue a credit card account under an open end consumer credit plan to, or establish such an account on behalf of, an obligor who has not attained the age of 21; or

''(B) APPLICATION REQUIREMENTS.—A written request or application to open a credit card account under an open end consumer credit plan, or to increase the amount of credit authorized to be extended under such an account, submitted by an obligor who has not attained the age of 21 as of the date of such submission, shall require—

''(i) submission by the obligor of information regarding any other credit card account under an open end consumer credit plan issued to, or established on behalf of, the obligor (other than an account established in response to a written request or application that meets the requirements of clause (ii) or (iii)), indicating that the proposed extension of credit under the account for which the written request or application is submitted would not thereby increase the total amount of credit extended to the obligor under any such account to an amount in excess of $1,500 (which amount shall be adjusted annually by the Board to account for any increase in the Consumer Price Index);

''(ii) the signature of a parent or guardian of that obligor indicating joint liability for debts incurred in connection with the account before the obligor attains the age of 21; or

''(iii) submission by the obligor of financial information indicating an independent means of repaying any obligation arising from the proposed extension of credit in connection with the account.

''(C) NOTIFICATION.—A card issuer of a credit card account under an open end consumer credit plan shall notify any obligor who has not attained the age of 21 that the obligor is not eligible for an extension of credit in connection with the account unless the requirements of this paragraph are met.

''(D) LIMIT ON ENFORCEMENT.—A card issuer may not collect or otherwise enforce a debt arising from a credit card account under an open end consumer credit plan if the obligor had not attained the age of 21 at the time the debt was incurred, unless the requirements of this paragraph have been met with respect to that obligor.

''(6) PARENTAL APPROVAL REQUIRED TO INCREASE CREDIT LINES FOR ACCOUNTS FOR WHICH PARENT IS JOINTLY LIABLE.—In addition to the requirements of paragraph (5), no increase may be made in the amount of credit authorized to be extended under a credit card account under an open end credit plan for which a parent or guardian of the obligor has joint liability for debts incurred in connection with the account before the obligor attains the age of 21, unless the parent or guardian of the obligor approves, in writing, and assumes joint liability for, such increase.''.

(c) EFFECTIVE DATE.—Paragraphs (5) and (6) of section 127(c) of the Truth in Lending Act, as amended by this section, shall apply to the issuance of credit card accounts under open end consumer credit plans, and the increase of the amount of credit authorized to be extended thereunder, as described in those paragraphs, on and after the date of enactment of this Act.

AMENDMENT NO. 2755

(Purpose: To discourage indiscriminate extensions of credit and resulting consumer insolvency, and for other purposes)

At the appropriate place, insert the following:

SEC. ___. ENCOURAGING CREDITWORTHINESS.

(a) SENSE OF THE CONGRESS.—It is the sense of the Congress that—

(1) certain lenders may sometimes offer credit to consumers indiscriminately, without taking steps to ensure that consumers are capable of repaying the resulting debt, and in a manner which may encourage certain consumers to accumulate additional debt; and

(2) resulting consumer debt may increasingly be a major contributing factor to consumer insolvency.

(b) STUDY REQUIRED.—The Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System (hereafter in this section referred to as the ''Board'') shall conduct a study of—

(1) consumer credit industry practices of soliciting and extending credit—

(A) indiscriminately;

(B) without taking steps to ensure that consumers are capable of repaying the resulting debt; and

(C) in a manner that encourages consumers to accumulate additional debt; and

(2) the effects of such practices on consumer debt and insolvency.

(c) REPORT AND REGULATIONS.—Not later than 12 months after the date of enactment of this Act, the Board—

(1) shall make public a report on its findings with respect to the indiscriminate solicitation and extension of credit by the credit industry;

(2) may issue regulations that would require additional disclosures to consumers; and

(3) may take any other actions, consistent with its existing statutory authority, that the Board finds necessary to ensure responsible industrywide practices and to prevent resulting consumer debt and insolvency.

Mrs. FEINSTEIN. I ask unanimous consent that the amendments be set aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments will be set aside.

AMENDMENT NO. 2751

Mrs. FEINSTEIN. Madam President, today I rise in support of the amendment offered by the minority leader to raise the minimum wage from $5.15 to $6.15 in two steps by September 1 of the year 2000. Before addressing my remarks directly, I want to make two comments. The first is really to thank the senior Senator from Massachusetts for his prodigious, sustained, and enthusiastic work on a minimum wage increase. I very much doubt that this would be on the calendar were it not for his constant perseverance.

The second is to say that I do not believe there is any piece of legislation that has been passed by this Congress or this Senate this year that can have the possible positive impact on Americans an increase in the minimum wage will at this particular point in time. I want to make that argument.

This amendment is about families making ends meet. It is about people being able to pay for rent and put food on the table. The bottom line is that the current minimum wage is simply not enough to live on. An estimated 11.4 million workers will benefit from the passage of this amendment; 1.5 million of them are in California alone. For a full-time worker, a $1 an hour increase in the minimum wage means a $2,000 a year raise. That is an extra $2,000 to pay the rent, to buy groceries, to send their children to school. For these workers, an increase in the minimum wage will make a huge difference.

Although the number of people living in poverty in the United States since 1992 has declined—and it has—by about 9 percent, from 38 million people to 34.5 million people, in California the number of people living in poverty has actually remained relatively unchanged, 5.19 million people to 5.12 million people living in poverty.

As recently as 1997, California has actually seen a 5 percent increase in the number of people living in poverty. Despite the incredible economic growth the United States has experienced throughout the mid and late 1990s, in California more than 15 percent of the population of the seventh largest economic engine on Earth lives in poverty. That is incredible. This troubling statistic clearly shows that not all segments of the workforce are benefiting from the economic expansion.

On September 4, the Center on Budget and Policy Priority released what I am sure my colleagues know, and hopefully will agree, is a very disturbing report on the widening gap between the rich and the poor over the last 20 years. California is an example of that gap.

Based on data collected by the Congressional Budget Office, the study found that the average after-tax income of the top 20 percent of households increased from about $74,000 in 1977 to more than $102,000 in 1999. The average after-tax income of the top 1 percent of the economic earners in this country will almost double, going from $234,000 to $515,000 in 1999. This indicates that those in the top income levels are doing very well all across this great Nation.

The bad news is that the income of the bottom fifth of households is actually falling. It has fallen from $9,900 to $8,700 over the same period.

So while the top income earners are prospering, those at the lower end of the income scale are doing worse than a generation ago.

When you have a high-cost State, this chasm is actually exaggerated. So what you have is a growing split between the very wealthy and the very poor in this country.

In 1977, the top 1 percent of the U.S. households received 7.3 percent of the Nation's after-tax income, and 22 years later that has gone up; they received 12.9 percent. That is a 4.4 percent increase for upper income Americans. In fact, the top 1 percent will receive as much after-tax income as the bottom 38 percent. This means the 2.7 million wealthiest Americans will be earning the same amount as the poorest 100 million Americans.

That is the case with 15 percent of the people in California.

Over the past several years, we have seen an explosion in the creation of wealth that is unprecedented in U.S. history. The strong economy has brought prosperity to large numbers of people. But that is not the whole story. More individuals and families are earning less and having a difficult time making ends meet.

It is time, I think, that we recognize this and do something about it. Passing the Daschle amendment is the first step we can take—50-cent minimum wage increase the first year and 50-cent minimum wage the second year.

Perhaps the greatest testament to the inadequacy of the minimum wage is that many communities are now recognizing how inadequate it is. And they are moving on their own to create a new concept that is called a ''living wage.'' These jurisdictions are insisting that those who do business with the local government pay their employees a living wage salary.

San Jose, CA, has adopted a living wage of $10.75.

In San Antonio, TX, it is $10.13 an hour.

In Boston, it is $8.23 an hour.

In my hometown of San Francisco, there is consideration ongoing for a living wage of $11.

More than 35 other localities and municipalities have adopted living wages. Clearly, it is a reaction to the inadequacy of the Federal minimum wage, which is generally too little too late to sustain people. So it is time for the Federal Government to follow the lead of our cities and take the simple step that is so important to millions of working families.

Many families in this country are just one paycheck away from disaster, whether it is an illness, the need to move, or a car that breaks down. People live paycheck to paycheck, and they live with the fear that they might not be able to make it this month or next month.

I think those figures and those statements are responsible for some of the things the Senator from Massachusetts pointed out on the floor a little bit earlier: The fear that families have, the stress that women work under, and the additional hours for women in the workplace more than men, the fact that so many children wish their family could have less stress, and could spend more time with them is all a part of this picture.

People can work 40 hours a week. In the most industrialized country on Earth, those people still can't support their family, still can't repair a broken car, still can't pay their rent, and still live from paycheck to paycheck.

In fact, a minimum-wage worker who works 40 hours a week 50 weeks a year earns only $10,300 a year. The poverty line for a family of three is $13,880, and, for a family of four, it is $16,700.

So you have a worker who is working at a minimum-wage job and has a family, that worker is substantially below the poverty level and the family is below the poverty level. What happens? People are forced to hold two jobs. Families are forced to have both parents working. Children are often left alone because child care, of course, is too costly or nonexistent.

Let me give you one case, a resident of San Francisco. Her name is Bernardine Emperado. She works more than 60 hours a week at a rental car job, and she supplements this salary by selling hot dogs at 49ers games on Sunday.

Nobody can tell me rental car agencies shouldn't pay a minimum wage of $6-plus. Nobody can ever convince me of that. Despite two incomes, she can't afford her own apartment. She lives with her mother and college-age daughter. Something is seriously wrong with our wage scale if someone working 60 hours a week is unable to afford life's basic necessities.

The traditional argument against raising the minimum wage is that when you increase wages, it costs jobs. And we just heard the majority whip make that point eloquently. The facts don't bear that out. Since the minimum wage was increased in October of 1996, we have gained 8.7 million new jobs in this country, most of them in the form of small businesses and new businesses. As a matter of fact, that has been the explosion—new businesses, small businesses, just the businesses that pay many of their people a minimum-wage salary.

In a strong economy, raising the minimum wage will not cost jobs. And it is time to do it. As a matter of fact, there is no better time to do it than when the economy is flush. And the economy has not been this flush in a long time.

I say to you that if we fail to raise the minimum wage, and to raise it on a regular basis, we will see virtually every city in this Nation, in addition to the 35 that are now doing it, enact their own living wage. This will vary. I think we will increasingly find this minimum wage is going to be $10 or more if it is left to the city.

I think it is prudent to raise the minimum wage. I think this is the time to do it. I think it is unfair to ask someone to live on $10,000. I think for the millions of workers who, as a product of this action, will have $2,000 more in their pocket to pay for rent, to pay for clothes, to fix a car, to make a move, this is the single most important piece of social economic legislation this body can pass.

I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SANTORUM). The Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I yield myself 10 minutes.

I am very pleased to introduce a minimum wage amendment on behalf of myself and many other Senators. With reference to the minimum wage, this coming January under the amendment Senator KENNEDY introduced, minimum wage goes up 50 cents; 12 months later it goes up 50 cents again. Under the proposal which I offer today, it will go up 35 cents, 35 cents, and 30 cents each March 1. It is also a $1 increase in minimum wage. It takes 12 months longer, so this will be completed in 2002. At that point, it will be $6.15.

I think Senator NICKLES made a point. If the economy, or if training people for jobs, or if employers being able to pay for the services employees render, if none of that was relevant, then everyone would like a minimum wage bill that might be higher than either of these two. That is what we would wish for everyone.

Up front, I remind everyone the best economic advice we have is 50 percent of the minimum-wage jobs affected have to do with teenagers. Half of the minimum-wage jobs we are talking about are the young men and women who are working while they are attending school—afterschool and in the summer months—at either the McDonald's drive-ins or various places across America.

It seems to this Senator, a minimum wage that applies to 50 percent of the minimum-wage earners in America, who are students, and that goes up 35 cents, 35 cents, and 30 cents, respectively, over the next 26 months, since it far exceeds inflation, it is good for the teenagers of America, good for those who hire them, and an excellent way to make sure that portion of the American population in their first entry jobs in our marketplace-oriented economy get a chance to earn that money, to learn what it is to work, and at the same time make that large group of young American men and women a part of the marketplace.

If we make it too high, businesses won't be hiring them and they will be looking to others to fill the jobs. We still need in America a place for people to start.

If we had a minimum wage bill and that is all we did, knowing what we know about welfare reform, we would not have a very good bill. The work opportunity credit, where employers give welfare men and women a job, is now a temporary work incentive credit; we make that permanent. That means as we have reduced the assistance for welfare in the United States by 48 percent, down to 2.7 million people, we want the employees of America to make a living wage. We want them to have a chance, but we also want to encourage them to be hired, even if there is some additional training and some skills that have to be added along the way.

We are increasing opportunities for the young people, and we are increasing many of the welfare-related jobs with this additional minimum wage we are adding. Many in this body worked hard on the work opportunity credit. I can recall back in the 1970s when I first came here, we started that as a work incentive program for the disadvantaged, disabled, and others by giving a tax credit. It was highly abused later. People wanted to get rid of it, but the idea remained to give American small business an opportunity to hire people who may need a little extra help, a little more guidance, a little more skill and training. We give them credit for that. We have done that.

We have two provisions in this amendment directed at health care. One of them is a very dramatic change from the way we have treated health care in the past. It is not going to cost very much because we are not so sure how many people will understand it. We are going to say to American men and women if they are not getting health insurance on their job, we give them an opportunity to buy their own health insurance and they can deduct every single penny of their health insurance from their pay before paying income tax.

Heretofore, we were letting them pool those expenses along with other health care costs and if that exceeded 7.5 percent of the income, they could deduct it. There are many people who work for small businesses and others would don't furnish insurance, and perhaps they could buy their own insurance. But right now, they don't get to deduct the premiums. We add that to the basket of opportunities for health insurance.

Then, there are the independent employees who work essentially for themselves. Under this bill, we finally make the health care costs 100 percent deductible. I think health insurance deduction is very important for the self-employed.

We increase the small business expensing, which means there are certain items they can deduct, up to $30,000 under this new law in the year of the expanse rather than having to charge it off over time, which is desired by small business that will bear the brunt of this added minimum wage.

We reduce the unemployment surtax, and we make permanent the work opportunity tax credit. A number of pension plans are reformed in this legislation so that more of the small businesses in this country will be able to take maximum advantage of their employees creating pension plans under the auspices of their employer as we currently have them in numerable places in the Tax Code.

We can talk about how this affects our individual States. I will have for the record how the Domenici plan will affect New Mexicans on the tax side once we have it figured out, as well as on the minimum wage side.

In summary, we will increase the minimum wage in the Domenici amendment—which the occupant of the Chair is a cosponsor, and I thank him for that—increase it $1, but it will take 12 additional months before we get to that. It will be 35 cents, 35 cents, and 30 cents. Senator KENNEDY does it in two installments. Senators have to decide which best fits the needs of our country.

If we were wishing and hoping, we would pay everybody a lot more. I repeat, half of the minimum wage earners in America are young people who are in part-time jobs, such as after-school and summer jobs. We believe the 3-year installment increase, which far exceeds inflation annually as it applies to the current minimum wage, is probably good for the teenagers of our country, good to keep them employed, get them that entrance job and not have so many owners looking around for other employees who have more experience, which they will if we make the minimum wage too high.

In addition, many of those getting off welfare—and we know there are thousands—they need some training and some extra skills preparation and the like. We are hoping they will get jobs. We are increasing their take-home pay so they can, indeed, have a better chance of succeeding off the rolls and move up the employment chain and get better and better jobs. The other things I mentioned in the health care field will be welcomed by millions of Americans, and in particular millions, millions of self-employed business men and women across America.

With that, I know there are others who would like to speak, if not tonight, we obviously will share time with them tomorrow.

I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time? The Senator from Montana.

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, will somebody yield time to me?

Mr. KENNEDY. Yes. I yield 10 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is recognized for 10 minutes.

AMENDMENT NO. 2751

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I was very impressed with the statement of the Senator from Massachusetts earlier when he showed us the charts of how minimum wage has not kept up with inflation. As I recall the chart of the Senator, it was very dramatic, showing with the minimum wage increase of $1 over 2 years, still we would not keep up with inflation in real terms.

He had a second chart. If you chart the poverty line, you will see the minimum wage has constantly been below the poverty line. So for all those who are worried about statistics and figures, rest assured this increase in the minimum wage proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts is not above inflation. It may be true in 1 year's time it is above what inflation might be in that single year, but on the question whether minimum wage has kept up with inflation or not, historically it has not kept up with inflation.

Second, I want to relate a personal story which made a huge difference to me.

Mr. KENNEDY. Will the Senator be good enough to yield on that point?

Mr. BAUCUS. Yes.

Mr. KENNEDY. The Senator talked about the poverty line and the minimum wage. There is a third element, and that is productivity. As we pointed out in the earlier presentation, the productivity in the last 10 years has increased by 12 percent, and the total wages of all workers, 1.9 percent.

The Senator, as a member of the Finance Committee, knows one of the key elements in an economic analysis is the issue of productivity. Here we have fallen so far behind, not only in the poverty rate but also in productivity growth.

Mr. BAUCUS. That is an excellent point. I regret telling the Senator from Massachusetts I was not able to see that chart, but I am glad the Senator has explained this point. It is absolutely true. If you increase productivity, and everybody knows productivity means the amount of output per worker hour—if productivity has increased dramatically, that is all the more reason why it is unfair the minimum wage has not kept up with inflation. The amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts will help accommodate that.

The point I was going to make is when I last ran for reelection, I walked across our State. I will never forget talking to a woman, a single mom, who told me how hard she worked to try to stay off welfare. She had a minimum-wage job in my home State.

She tried for a couple of years to stay off welfare. She was determined to stay off welfare. It was a matter of principle, a matter of pride. She slept on the sofa in her parents' home, she did all the things she could do to cut corners so she could raise her young child and stay off welfare. But she finally realized with her minimum-wage job and the day-care costs—I have forgotten the exact percent, but it was 30 or 40 percent of her take-home pay went to childcare—she could not do it. She had to finally give up and go onto welfare because her minimum-wage job did not earn her enough money for her and her child to survive.

We can help get people off the welfare rolls by increasing minimum wage. It is not the total solution. There are lots of parts to that problem, lots of parts to the solution. But certainly, raising the minimum wage makes a huge difference.

I might also add, in my home State of Montana there is a very unfortunate economic trend. In 1946, Montana ranked 10th in per capita income. In roughly 1992 or 1993, Montana ranked not 10th anymore but about 35th or 36th. Where does Montana rank today in per capita income? It depends on how you calculate it, but 48th, 49th, or 50th.

The State used to be a natural resources, commodity-based State with mining business and timber industries that had good-paying jobs; in agriculture income was up too. Today, those mining jobs, those timber industry jobs, those commodity-based resource jobs are disappearing because of the greater importance of value added. We are now becoming a tourism State, a recreation State, a service industry State. And service industries pay very low wages compared with commodity-based industries.

I am sure this is true in lots of other States in the Nation. An increase in the minimum wage is going to help increase the pay for service jobs, which is going to help a lot. I might also add keeping workers' pay up only makes sense; it is only fair because of all the profits so many companies have received, particularly over the past couple or 3 years, the best evidence of which is the skyrocketing increases of the stock indexes on the various stock exchanges.

It was said earlier this is just a minimum wage for younger people. Mr. President, I am sure you have experienced this. When you stop in McDonald's, you go to a store, say a Penny's or some store downtown, you are going to find a lot of medium-age people and older people working there. I am astounded at the number of older women who work at McDonald's. I am astounded. This is not only a younger person's issue. In fact, if statistics were shown, my guess is it would be more of a women's issue and a medium-age issue—people having a hard time making ends meet, not school kids working for pocket change.

Not only should there be an increase in the minimum wage—and I think the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts is more than fair—the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts is paid for. I ask consent to speak for 5 more minutes

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield 5 more minutes.

Mr. BAUCUS. The amendment by the Senator from Massachusetts is paid for. What do I mean by that? By that I mean that the cost to the private sector of this increase, by CBO estimates, might be roughly $30 billion over 10 years. The amendment by the Senator from Massachusetts has several key tax cut provisions that would help offset whatever cost businesses might experience in paying the increased minimum wage. I would like to highlight just a couple.

One of the main provisions is a small business pension startup tax credit. We want to help small business. We want to help small business provide pensions for their employees. We all know one of the big problems today is that while big businesses usually provide good pensions for their employees, small businesses do not, because of their narrower profit margins. It is very difficult to begin a small business. Startup costs in particular make the early years very difficult, because you have to pay that payroll tax on the first day of business whether or not you make a profit, and when you start out in small business you are not going to make a profit that first day. You don't have to pay income taxes, but you have to pay that payroll tax. Small businesses therefore have a very hard time doing what a lot of those small businesses want to do: Set up a pension fund for their employees.

If we are going to solve the retirement problem of this country, we certainly have to reform Social Security, and we certainly have to increase private savings. But we all know that a third leg of the retirement stool is pension benefits. We clearly need more incentives so small business can provide pension benefits to their employees. They will be better employees. They will be more likely to stay there. They are going to be more committed to the business. And they are going to be more committed to helping that company make a buck. Our package has a tax credit for small businesses, about $4 billion, to help make that happen.

What else do we do? We accelerate the 100-percent deduction of health insurance for the self-employed. The Republican bill does that, and so do we. It is very important that self-employed people get the health insurance deduction quickly.

Other major highlights: Our bill has a tax credit for information technology training expenses. We have heard it many times that a lot of small firms cannot find enough good employees. There are not enough around. We provide a tax credit to those companies for technology training expenses. It makes a lot of sense.

We also provide $2 billion over 10 years for a low-income housing tax credit, to help reduce housing costs of the buildings so many workers earning minimum wages live in.

We provide estate tax relief. Strangely, that is not in the bill offered by the other side. We offer estate tax relief targeted to family-owned businesses.

We increase the unified credit by $450,000 phased in to the year 2003.

In addition, we increase the small business meals deduction up to 60 percent in the year 2002. These are all provisions targeted to small business.

Rather than risking dipping into the Social Security Trust Fund, however, we pay for our provisions.

Why do I say all that? Because the alternative offered on the other side is much more expensive. It will lose about $75 billion in revenue and there are no offsets for the lost revenue. Our proposal provides offsets for the $28 billion tax cut. The major offsets are extending the current Superfund tax and, second, closing corporate tax shelters. We close down a lot of loopholes in current law of which many companies are taking advantage.

Let me say a couple of words about the ''pay for.'' Right now, the balance in the Superfund trust fund is declining dramatically. In 1996, the balance in the Superfund trust fund was about $4 billion. The estimate for this next year is about $1 billion.

Why is that important? That is important to continue cleanups under the Superfund Program. If the trust fund is declining rapidly and gets close to zero, we are not going to have the cleanups this country wants. That is, ground water is going to be polluted, drinking water polluted, hazardous waste in the soil. It is very important we extend the Superfund provisions so the trust fund has the requisite dollars to continue cleanups, irrespective of whether we modify the Superfund law. I hope we do. But the trust fund is going to decline to zero pretty quickly whether or not Congress reauthorizes the trust fund.

Second, if we continue this Superfund tax, the Appropriations Committee is more likely to fund Superfund. Technically, it does not have to though it usually appropriates dollars anyway. If the amount of money in the trust fund continues to be level and does not taper off—and I note that it has been tapering off without the continuation of the tax—it is more likely the Appropriations Committee is going to find the dollars for Superfund cleanups. If we do not reinstate the trust fund, what is going to happen? Instead of the polluter paying for the cleanup, it will be the general revenue taxpayer who will pay to clean up. The polluters will not be paying for it; the general revenue taxpayer will pay for the pollution caused by major companies. It is imperative we extend the Superfund tax.

The second major ''pay for'' provision we have in our bill is targeted toward tax shelters. Every time Congress shuts down some abusive tax shelters, tax attorneys are so smart, they figure out another loophole and a way to beat the system. What we are saying is for $10 billion over 10 years, let's enact a provision which makes transactions such as this much more difficult.

Many organizations testified there is a problem that needs to be addressed in this area. The American Bar Association, the New York State Bar Association, the American Association of CPAs, and many others have testified there has to be a solution to this problem.

Even Congressman ARCHER has admitted we have been very successful in shutting down about $50 billion of specific shelters over the last 5 years, and those are just the tip of the iceberg, according to a lot of practitioners.

So to summarize reasons to support our amendment: No. 1, we increase minimum wage because it makes sense, and lets people keep up with inflation. No. 2, we give tax breaks to small businesses that need it. They are very directed and targeted to the tune of about $28 billion. No. 3, we pay for our tax breaks in a very fair way. Contrast that with the other side, which stretches out the minimum wage increase, which hurts people and, in addition, has a tax bill which is not targeted.

I ask for a few more minutes.

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield 3 more minutes.

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I have a chart. I noticed the Senator from New Mexico was looking at it with a quizzical expression on his face. The source is the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities. Everybody has a chart these days. Essentially, this chart shows the assumptions. This line shows the on-budget deficit.

The chart assumes we will continue 1999 discretionary spending levels inflated for present CPI and historical levels of emergency spending, which is an average of the last 8 years. It only addresses spending. What this chart does not show is how much the deficit is going to increase if we pass the tax cut bill from the other side, about $75 billion.

This chart shows that, even without the tax cut the other side wants to enact, we are not going to reach a surplus until the year 2005 under current scorekeeping. If you add to that the $75 billion tax cut, it is clearly going to be a lot later before we even get a surplus. Do not forget, you have to add in the last interest and expenses that otherwise would be available.

This is a no-brainer. Let's increase minimum wage fairly. Then let's enact tax provisions, tax cuts targeted to small business. Let's pay for it in a responsible way. Otherwise, we have the other side which is not paid for, a huge tax break which the President is going to veto anyway. So let's pass something the President will sign.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

There appears to be a sufficient second.

Mr. DOMENICI. Is there any time before the vote or are we supposed to vote now?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Nine seconds.

AMENDMENT NO. 2547

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, if we pass this minimum wage bill that I offered today with the taxes we have on it, we would welcome the President vetoing it. As a matter of fact, I do not believe he would. We have not only the minimum wage, but these are the right kinds of tax cuts to go along with it, and they are very desirable for the American economy right now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

VOTE ON AMENDMENT NO. 1730, AS MODIFIED

The amendment (No. 1730), as modified, was agreed to:

AMENDMENT NO. 2751

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, how much time does our side have?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FITZGERALD). The Senator from Massachusetts controls 27 minutes.

Mrs. MURRAY. Mr. President, I rise today in strong support of the Kennedy amendment and as a cosponsor of the minimum wage increase.

In this debate, many people have the wrong idea about who this increase would affect. Many people think the typical wage earner is a young man or woman flipping burgers or working at a convenience store trying to make a few extra dollars to buy some CD's or to go to the movies. That image is inaccurate. And until we really understand who the people are who rely on the minimum wage, we won't approach this debate with the urgency it requires.

To clear up that misconception, let me set the record straight. In reality, 70 percent of the people earning a minimum wage are over the age of 20. That means that 11.4 million adults this year will have to try to live on a salary of $10,700.

Forty percent of these same adults are the sole source of income for their families. These are people who are working hard—just to get by and support their families. They deserve a fighting chance.

I am especially concerned that 59 percent of those struggling on the minimum wage are women. 6.8 million women—many of these single mothers—would benefit directly from this increase.

These single mothers are doing their best. They are trying to raise two kids—on average—on a below-poverty income. And how does this Congress support these struggling parents? By attacking programs like Medicaid, by cutting child care support, by taking away funding for nutrition programs, and by taking actions that hurt working families in need.

These are the same group of people that Congress says it wants to keep off of public support.

But how does this Congress support these struggling parents? By cutting vital programs and fighting efforts like this one—an effort that will help them work themselves above the poverty line.

This amendment does not eliminate jobs. It keeps people working—people who otherwise would be completely reliant on public support. Just a $1.00 raise would generate $2,000 in potential income for minimum wage workers. For an average family of four, that means 7 months of groceries, 5 months of rent, or 13 months of health care expenses.

I reached my decision to support this increase after very careful consideration. I have listened to the concerns of small business owners from across my state, who shared with me their thoughts about this increase.

I am happy to say that most of the businesses in Washington state are experiencing unprecedented growth.

In fact, since the federal minimum wage was last increased in 1996–97, employment in Washington has grown. Since September 1996, 231,900 new jobs have been created in Washington state—an increase of 9.5%. Washington's economy is strong, and our low-wage workers should share in that success.

Because my constituents understand the value of the minimum wage, they overwhelmingly passed their own minimum wage increase last year in Washington state. They raised the state minimum wage to $5.70 this year. In the year 2000, it will move to $6.50, and after that it will be indexed based on the Consumer Price Index. Mr. President, we should follow the example of my state and increase the minimum wage for all Americans.

The increase that we passed in the last Congress should be the first step—not the last—on our road to help these hard-working citizens.

It should be the first step because the economy and our world have changed—and we need to keep up with those changes. In 1979, a person could work 40 hours a week at minimum wage and stay out of poverty. Today, it takes 52 hours. To just reach the poverty line for a family of four, the minimum wage would have to be $7.89. That's why our last increase was a good start and why this proposed increase is the next vital step to helping these working families rise out of poverty.

Overall, a slight increase in the minimum wage provides those who work hard and play-by-the-rules an increased opportunity to succeed. If any of my colleagues oppose this minimum wage increase, I would ask them to consider trying to live on $10,700 this year—not just live on it—but try to raise a family on it. I think when you consider this debate in those terms, the right thing to do becomes clear.

It would be embarrassing if this Congress voted to raise its own salary but didn't vote to let hard-working American families work their way out of poverty.

I urge my colleagues to vote to increase the minimum wage. Let's show the American people that we have our priorities straight.

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield 10 minutes to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. DOMENICI. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. DURBIN. Yes.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, might I ask, is the Senator speaking on his time on the Domenici amendment?

Mr. DURBIN. That's correct.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that, following the distinguished Senator from Illinois, Senator KAY BAILEY HUTCHISON be the next speaker on our side.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Senator from Illinois is recognized.

Mr. DURBIN. Mr. President, when the Senate returns tomorrow morning, our very first vote will be an important one for literally millions of American workers and families, and some 320,000 in Illinois, who are watching carefully to see if this Senate is listening to America. It is the question of the minimum wage and whether or not it is going to be increased.

Senator KENNEDY has a proposal that I support which calls for an increase in the minimum wage from the current level of $5.15 an hour to 50 cents more on January 1 of the year 2000, and then 50 cents again on the following January 1.

So that those who are going to work every single day, trying to raise their families, trying to make a decent income, will, in fact, move closer to a livable wage. This is still a long way away from it because people who are earning $5.15 an hour or $6.15 an hour hardly live in the lap of luxury.

There is a noteworthy difference between the approach being suggested by my friend and colleague, the Senator from New Mexico, on the Republican side, and the suggestion of Senator KENNEDY, my friend and colleague on the Democratic side, when it comes to a minimum wage. The difference may seem cosmetic to those who do not take a close look because the Republican side suggests that to raise the minimum wage by $1, we should take an extra year or 3 years instead of 2 to achieve this.

What does that mean to the working person? If the Republican approach should pass, it means $1,200. For someone making $50,000 a year or $100,000, or more, $1,200 hardly seems to be a grand amount of money to be worried over when you stretch it over a period of time. But imagine if your income was only $10,000 a year on a minimum wage, and what is at stake here is $1,200. The Republican approach would shortchange those who go to work every single day in America on a minimum wage by $1,200 as they stretch this out over a 3-year period of time.

Of course, the bill does much more than address the increase in the minimum wage. It also addresses some needed changes in tax law.

I support Senator KENNEDY's approach. He does provide the kind of relief which small businesses need in order to find the tax relief to provide things for their employees. It is a proposal from Senator CHUCK ROBB of Virginia and Senator Max BAUCUS of Montana, a small business tax proposal which, among other things, finally puts a 100-percent deduction for the health insurance costs of self-employed people. The Senate and Congress have been moving toward this goal. This bill will achieve it on the Democratic side, if it is passed.

It also provides assistance to small businesses that provide child care. Think about families, particularly single mothers and single parents who have to worry every single day whether or not their kids are safe. This is an incentive for small businesses to provide child care facilities, a tax credit, one that can assist them and their workers.

In addition, there is a pension package which has been supported by Senator GRAHAM, a Democrat of Florida, and Senator GRASSLEY, a Republican of Iowa. The Democratic package is not only a well-balanced package providing child care health and retirement benefits for small businesses, but more important than anything, the Democratic package is paid for. It is paid for. The Republican package of tax changes is not.

In other words, it is an extension of the possibility of debt. It is a promise that can't be kept. The Democratic package is paid for. The Republican one is not. The Democratic package increases the minimum wage over 2 years by $1 an hour, and the Republicans over 3 years costing workers $1,200 by taking the Republican approach.

I say to those who are working across America that this is hardly what they need. It is curious to me that only a few weeks ago, the same Republican Party that cannot produce $1,200 for people who get up and go to work every day at minimum-wage jobs came before us with a $792 billion tax cut primarily for wealthiest people in this country.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, can we have order? The Senator deserves to be heard.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order.

The Senator from Illinois.

Mr. DURBIN. I thank the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. President, consider that only a few weeks ago, this Chamber was seriously considering a $792 billion tax cut for some of the wealthiest people in America, and many people on the other side of the aisle said that is good, wise policy. Alan Greenspan of the Federal Reserve didn't think so. Frankly, the people of America don't think so. They told the Republican Party to keep this tax cut primarily for wealthy people.

Now comes a proposal from the Republican side when it comes to the working families that would cut out $1,200 in income, $1,200 to a family making about $10,000 a year. That is an upside down priority. That is a priority that forgets the real people who are working in this country to make America strong. Eleven point four million workers would get a pay increase with the Democratic Kennedy minimum wage increase package, and with this proposed increase that Senator KENNEDY has proposed and I am supporting, it means over $2,000 a year for people who are scraping to get by, primarily women who are in the minimum wage workforce, African-Americans, and Hispanics, people who go to work every single day who understand the importance of work and deserve our respect for doing so.

The vote tomorrow morning will be a measure of how much respect we have for them. This $2,000 increase for these workers can mean 7 months of groceries, 5 months of rent, 10 months of utilities, tuition and fees at a community college so one of their kids has a chance to even have a better and more successful life.

I say to the Senate this is a test. It is a test as we wrap up this session about where our values will be. Will they be with these working families? Will we make certain they get an increase in their basic wage or will we stand with those who want to delay it and delay and delay it? The argument is often made that if you increase the minimum wage, you are going to lose jobs.

Take a look at my home State of Illinois. Since the 1996 increase in the minimum wage, take a look at the real statistics: 268,100 new jobs since we last increased the minimum wage; 33,100 new retail jobs, the area where most minimum-wage jobs are found; unemployment is down 10 percent; and the unemployment rate is 4.7 percent.

As we increase the minimum wage, we have not seen all of the things that the Republicans tell us we should be afraid of—afraid of losing jobs and creating chaos in the workplace. Exactly the opposite has happened across America. Since we last raised the minimum wage, we have seen an economy moving forward.

Now the real test for this Senate is whether or not we are going to bring on board this ship as it moves forward the people who get up and go to work every single day, the men and women who work in the convenience stores, who make our beds in motels and hotels we stay in overnight, the folks who serve our food and cook it in the kitchen. These are the invisible people who keep America moving forward. But these invisible people will be watching tomorrow to see if this Senate is going to give the minimum wage increase which is so essential.

I hope those on the Republican side who are preaching fiscal integrity and fiscal soundness will think twice about voting for a bill that not only stretches the minimum wage an extra year but provides tax cuts without compensating offsets. What does that mean in layman's terms? The Republican package doesn't pay for the tax cuts that they are trying to enact. They have some good ideas, I am sure. But it isn't honest if you didn't pay for them.

What Senator KENNEDY and the Democrats have done, what we have said is when it comes to small business and the tax proposal, we have the means of paying for them. And by and large, we are going to make sure that when the small businesses that enact these increases in the minimum wage turn to us and say, are you listening to some of our other concerns, the answer will be yes. We want to make sure you can deduct every single penny of your health insurance premiums as every major corporation can. Self-employed people, farmers, and small businesses deserve the same benefit: Make sure that there is a facility available for child care; make sure that a pension package can be offered—things that will help small businesses extend opportunities for their workforce and create better employee moral and productivity.

I close by saying that this vote tomorrow morning at 10:30 is a test of the Senate's will and the Senate's values. I hope that we will stand by people who go to work every single day.

It is one thing to preach on the floor about people looking for a handout; these folks are looking for a hand up. They are working and need assistance and an increase in their minimum wage. I rise in strong support of the proposal by Senator KENNEDY. I hope my colleagues on both sides of the aisle will join me.

I yield the floor.

AMENDMENT NO. 2547

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas is recognized.

Mrs. HUTCHISON. Mr. President, I rise to support the Domenici substitute for the Kennedy amendment because I think it strikes the balance we need to have. We have a strong economy today. We want to make sure it stays strong. We are talking about a minimum wage increase that is $1 over a period of 3 years. This should not be a shock to the small businesses, the farmers, and the ranchers who are concerned about having base costs go up—not even people who don't pay minimum wage but people who are concerned about paying at the higher levels and increasing the potential for inflation. I think stretching it out over 1 more year makes sense.

I also think we need to look at the small business tax cuts we tried to give to small businesses in the tax cut package the President vetoed. We have brought some of those back. It provides a balance of adding more to the working person, especially the part-time worker, but also giving a little bit of tax help to the self-employed and small business people who might get hit by having the whole wage scale increased. What we are looking for is balance.

I will talk about a few of the tax cuts with which we are going to try to help small business. First is an amendment from a bill I introduced that is called the Bonus Incentive Act. Today, employers can give a performance-based bonus to a person who is exempt, a salaried employee, and that person will be able to take that bonus, pay their withholding taxes, and go on their merry way; an employer can't do that for an hourly employee. If they give a performance-based bonus to an hourly employee, the employer has to go back and figure the whole year's wages and refigure any overtime pay that has been given to that employee. Many employers say it is just not worth the trouble, or they try to disguise the bonus as something else.

Employers have come to Congress and testified they want to be able to reward hourly employees for good service. At the House Education and Workforce Committee, Pam Farr, the former senior vice president for Marriott Lodging, recently testified that Marriott used game-sharing plans for customer service personnel that rewarded employees for friendly treatment of customers. Cordant Technologies, which makes solid rocket boosters for the space shuttle, rewards their workers for reaching goals, for workplace safety, indirect cost reduction, and customer satisfaction. Many employers are concerned about all the paperwork that would have to be prepared if they gave this employment bonus. In other testimony from a human resources director, it took 4 people 160 hours to calculate the bonuses for 235 employees.

What has been incorporated into the Domenici amendment makes it easy for employers to give performance-based bonuses to hourly employees. There is no reason we should have a big, mumbo-jumbo set of regulations that make it difficult. We want to make it easier for those employees to be rewarded for merit.

Other tax relief in this bill is an above-the-line real deduction for health insurance expenses for individuals who don't have health care coverage. I know people who don't have insurance who have huge medical bills. Why shouldn't they be able to deduct all of their medical expenses if they don't have employer-provided insurance coverage? It also provides 100-percent deductibility for health care insurance for the self-employed.

I think it should be the goal of everyone in this Chamber to encourage employers to be able to give health insurance to their employees and for the self-employed or the individual to buy health insurance. Why wouldn't we give incentives for people to buy health care insurance? We have been talking about that for the last 5 years. Why don't we put our incentives where they can make a difference?

It also accelerates an increase in small business expensing. This is particularly helpful for farmers with direct expensing and accelerating the expensing, especially for small businesses. It reduces the Federal unemployment tax that small businesses pay from 0.8 percent to 0.6 percent. It makes permanent the work opportunity tax credit. This is a very important tax credit that is an incentive for people to hire people off welfare. It gives a tax credit of up to $2,400 for wages paid to employees who are hired right off the welfare rolls. We think this is a wonderful opportunity to give the people whom we want to give a chance at contributing to their families, coming off welfare, to have that incentive for the employer to hire the person off welfare and give that person that first chance to be a contributing member of society.

These are some of the tax relief parts of the bill I think are so important.

There is one more area I want to talk about because it is my amendment. This is an amendment I have introduced before. It was in the bill the President unfortunately vetoed. In fact, I introduced this bill 2 years ago. It allows women over 50 to have make-up payments to their pension plans. How many women do we know who have left the workforce to have their children or to raise their children until they go into elementary school, or perhaps they stay home and raise their children all the way through high school; then they come back into the workforce. Perhaps they lose their spouse and they don't have a good source of income. They go back to work, and they are penalized in their pension systems and their stability in their retirement years because they lost all those years that would allow them to start building that pension plan.

Women who leave the workforce to raise their children and then come back are penalized in this society. These are the people who need retirement stability the most. These are the people who live the longest and who don't have the same opportunity for a pension plan because they haven't been able to establish a pension over the years because they have stayed home and raised their children.

Senator DOMENICI's amendment allows women over 50 who are coming back into the workplace to make up the payments they have lost when they left the workplace. The Domenici amendment is a good amendment. It is a balanced amendment. It provides a minimum wage increase over a 3-year period, and it gives help and relief to the small businesses of our country that are going to be hit by the minimum wage increase. This will offset it.

These are good reliefs. It is relief for health insurance coverage. It is relief for people who have medical expenses, who don't have health care coverage. It is relief for small business expensing, relief for women who are discriminated against in the pension systems when they leave the workplace to raise their children and then cannot continue to contribute to their retirement systems. It reduces the Federal unemployment tax that is a huge burden on small businesses, and it makes permanent the Work Opportunity Tax Credit, the credit that gives a $2,400 tax credit to people who hire people off welfare.

I urge my colleagues to support this balanced approach, giving help to the workers, giving help to the small business people who may be affected by this added expense in their business. It is a fair approach. It is a balanced approach. I think it will have the best chance to keep our economy strong by keeping the people in business who are creating the jobs that keep this economy going. We want more opportunity for more workers, and that is what this amendment will do.

I urge support for the Domenici amendment.

I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, how much time do we have remaining?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has 17 minutes.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I yield myself 7 minutes.

Mr. President, I think it is probably appropriate the Senate take a moment to look at what the majority leader has stated about increasing the minimum wage. Over the course of the afternoon, we have had a number of speakers who have made a powerful case in favor of increasing the minimum wage. Yet we have against this background what the majority leader, Senator LOTT, said about our proposal:

> It will not go to the President. I can guarantee you that.

So the American people ought to understand no matter how they might agree with us and are convinced of both the importance and the fairness of the issue, that is the position of the majority leader. That is part of the difficulty and the complexity we have been facing over this whole year. There has been this unalterable opposition to any break for the hardest working Americans, the ones at the lower rung of the economic ladder. Even if we are able to somehow be successful in winning this tomorrow morning, it is not going to go to the President. He is going to use every effort he possibly can to defeat this.

Earlier this evening, the Senator from Oklahoma, Senator NICKLES, pointed out CBO estimates of a loss of 100,000 to 500,000 jobs. Those are absolutely identical figures to what they said when we raised it in 1996 and 1997. They were found to be completely inaccurate.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the references to 27 different studies that have been done nationwide, looking at the economic impact of the last increase in the minimum wage that will indicate positively that there has been an expansion of employment.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, perhaps tomorrow we will be able to take the time to talk about what is happening to minimum-wage workers. As I mentioned earlier today, minimum-wage workers are teachers' aides, nursing home aides. Nursing home aides have a 94-percent turnover. The principal reason for the turnover is because they are paid so poorly. They are the people working to try to provide some care and attention to the elderly. I see our good friend from Connecticut who has been a leader in establishing day care. The turnover that is taking place in the day-care centers is very similar. It is not quite as high but very dramatic. These are our children. This is our future. This is as a result of failing to provide an adequate increase in the minimum wage.

There are two final points I want to raise with regard to the Republican proposal. As has been mentioned earlier, the effect of the Republican proposal will mean that 3 years from now, the average minimum-wage worker will have made $1,200 less—$1,200 less—than they would have if we had passed the Daschle proposal. That is a lot of money for working Americans. That is 5 months of rent, a year of tuition, 6 months of utilities. This is important to hard-working Americans, make no mistake about it.

It might not mean a lot to Members of the Senate who have just voted themselves a $4,600 pay increase. We are not deferring that pay increase for Senators 2 years or 3 years. We are saying the minimum wage ought to be over a 2-year period. But our Republican friends say, no, let's spread it over 3 years. We are not doing that with regard to our pay increase.

I hope when Members go back and talk to their constituents, they are able to justify why we were worth $4,600 more this year while saying no to hard-working Americans—they are not worth 50 cents more next year and 50 cents more the year after.

Finally, I want to mention one very important aspect of the Republican proposal that has not been addressed.

I yield myself 2 more minutes, Mr. President.

With this particular chart, we illustrate what we have been facing over this past year with regard to the Republican attack on working families: Resisting a pay increase with the minimum wage; balancing the budget on the backs of the working poor. Governor Bush pointed that out. You do not have to hear it from Democrats. We have seen some retreat on that by the Republican leadership. Then providing pensions for the wealthiest individuals as they do under this proposal; blocking workers' rights to organize, the salting bill; and undermining worker safety, providing the waivers of penalties for violations of OSHA; cutting workers' pay.

You can say, where does that come in? Under the Republican proposal, they recalculate how overtime is going to be considered. This has not been done since 1945 when the proposal was struck down by the Supreme Court which said they basically, fundamentally undermine the Fair Labor Standards Act. If you take the Republican proposal on recomputing overtime, effectively you are undermining what many workers would be able to receive with an increase in the minimum wage. There has not been a word of that spoken by the proponents of this amendment. They tucked this right into their particular proposal.

Mr. WELLSTONE. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield for a question.

Mr. WELLSTONE. I am listening to this for the first time. This has not been a part of this debate. There are 73 million Americans right now who are entitled to overtime pay. Is the Senator saying part of the Republican amendment effectively repeals the overtime pay provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act, which act has been in effect for 60 years? This is a cornerstone of fairness for working families in this country. Is that what the Senator is saying?

Mr. KENNEDY. This Senator is saying there will be an overtime payment, but the overtime payment will be calculated in a way that will diminish, in a significant way, the actual overtime workers should be entitled to and the way it has been computed for the last 45 years. It is a dramatic change in the Fair Labor Standards Act.

The Supreme Court has said, as I said, if that provision had been accepted when it was offered in 1945, it effectively emasculates the overtime provision of the Fair Labor Standards Act. The overtime words will be there, there will be a base pay that they will pay overtime on, but not the way they are being paid now. The Republican proposal will undermine, in a significant and dramatic way, the way that hourly workers are being paid in the United States.

Mr. WELLSTONE. Mr. President, one final question for the Senator. If companies are going to now be able to make the payment in bonuses and do an end run, basically, around the Fair Labor Standards Act, which is so important to 73 million Americans who right now are entitled to that overtime pay, then am I not correct that what the Republicans are proposing is not a step forward, it is a great leap backward; that this overturns 60 years of sweat and tears of workers' commitment to getting a fair pay for fair work, including overtime work?

They give a minimum wage increase with one hand and then they basically repeal part of the Fair Labor Standards Act with the other hand. People need to understand this, I say to the Senator.

Mr. KENNEDY. The Senator is absolutely correct. It is one of the reasons why we ought to have an opportunity to debate this in the light of day, not under the time limit. We are forced to take these time limits in order to at least have a vote on the minimum wage. But this issue is too important to working families to be dismissed lightly. I hope, for reasons I have outlined briefly, the amendment of the Senator from New Mexico will not be accepted.

The Senator from Connecticut desires time. I know the Senator from Iowa wants time. Mr. President, how much time remains?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has 7 minutes 50 seconds.

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield 5 minutes to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, I thank my colleague for yielding this time. I commend him for his leadership on the minimum wage issue. There is so much to talk about concerning the proposal of the Senator from Massachusetts and the distinguishing features between that and what is being offered on the other side.

We are talking about a 50-cent increase over the next 2 years, as opposed to a 35-cent increase in year one and year two and a 30-cent increase in year three. But there is an added feature to the Republican proposal on which some may not have focused. While they are suggesting approximately 33 cents a year for minimum-wage workers, there is also roughly a $75 billion tax cut, the bulk of which goes to the top income earners of the country. That is part of their minimum wage package.

It is somewhat ironic that we are talking about a 30-cent to 35-cent increase for the lowest paid workers in the country instead of 50 cents, and we are going to have a $75 billion tax cut, the bulk of which goes to the top income earners in the country.

By the way, there is no offset for the $75 billion tax cut. We do not know where the money comes from to pay for that. We heard a lot of speeches in the last couple of weeks about not dipping into the Social Security trust funds. One basic question is, From where does the $75 billion come? How are we paying for that? I have yet to hear anybody explain from where it is going to come. I put that out for consideration as we talk about these amendments this evening.

It is extremely important for a lot of people that we increase the minimum wage; 11.4 million people will actually get a pay raise if the minimum wage increase goes into effect. Some may say the economy has been so great, everyone is doing so well, why do people at the minimum-wage level need to have any increase at all?

While the economy has been fabulous and unprecedented historically, not everybody in America has been the beneficiary of this great prosperity. For a lot of Americans in the bottom 20 percent of income earners, things have been rather stagnant. This income group has not seen the kind of tremendous increase in their earning power as have the top 1 percent of households.

The top 1 percent of households is expected to gain 115 percent in after-tax income as compared to an only 8-percent gain for the middle fifth of households in America. In contrast, the lowest fifth of households experienced a 9-percent decline during the same period, from 1977 through 1999.

If you were doing well in America in 1977, then you are doing even better today. If you are in the middle in America, you have had a slight increase of about 8 percent. If you are in the bottom 20 percent, you have actually seen a decline in your earning power in the last 20 years.

While we herald the great success of the economy with the lowest unemployment rates in years, we need to remind ourselves that for a lot of our citizens from Maine to California who work every day at the bottom levels of the economic ladder in this country, it has not been a great period for them.

We talk about 50 cents, $1 over 2 years. What better way to welcome the new millennium, than to say to 11.4 million workers in this country: We recognize your contributions to the success of this country by giving you a $1 increase over the next 2 years.

What does that amount to? How about 7 months of groceries; 5 months of rent for the average minimum-wage worker; 10 months of utility bills; about 1½ years of tuition and fees at a community college.

Mr. President, $1 over 2 years may not seem like a lot, but if you multiply that at a 40-hour workweek, 52 weeks a year, that dollar makes a huge difference to some of the lowest paid workers in America. Again I mention, there are 11.4 million workers who will directly benefit from the Kennedy proposal to increase the minimum wage.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has used his 5 minutes.

Mr. DODD. I ask for 1 additional minute.

Mr. HARKIN. I yield 1 minute.

Mr. DODD. Seventy percent of the workers who would benefit are over the age of 20; 59 percent are women; 46 percent of these people have full-time jobs; 15 percent are African American; 18 percent are Hispanic American; and 46 percent work in retail.

The great boom that has occurred in our economy has been magnificent for those at the upper-income levels. Unfortunately, after-tax income has remained relatively flat for those in the middle, and actually declined for those in the bottom 20 percent.

This minimum wage increase will make a difference to some of the hardest working people in this country. I hope by tomorrow when this issue comes for a vote, a proposal to increase the minimum wage, not smuggle a $75 billion tax cut without paying for it, will be the choice of the Senate.

I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa.

Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, how much time remains on this side on the minimum wage issue?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Thirty-nine minutes 39 seconds.

Mr. GRASSLEY. I yield myself such time as I might consume.

Mr. President, I rise today in support of the pension reform provisions which have been included in the minimum wage and business tax amendment sponsored by colleague Senator DOMENICI.

Earlier this year I cosponsored with Senator Bob GRAHAM of Florida, comprehensive pension reform legislation—S. 741, The Pension Coverage and Portability Act. Many of the provisions in S. 741 were included in the vetoed Taxpayer Refund Act of 1999. Now, those provisions have been included as part of the Republican minimum wage amendment.

Experts say that, ideally, pension benefits should comprise about a third of a retired worker's income. But pension benefits make up only about one-fifth of the income in elderly households. Obviously, workers are reaching retirement with too little income from an employer pension. Workers who are planning for their retirement will need more pension income to make up for a lower Social Security benefit and to support longer life expectancies. While we have seen a small increase in the number of workers who are expected to receive a pension in retirement, only one half of our workforce is covered by a pension plan.

There is a tremendous gap in pension coverage between small employers and large employers. Eighty-five percent of the companies with at least 100 workers offer pension coverage. Companies with less than 100 workers are much less likely to offer pension coverage. Only about 50 percent of the companies with less than 100 workers offer pension coverage. Small employers who may just be starting out in business are already squeezing every penny to make ends meet. These employers are also people who open up the business in the morning, talk to customers, do the marketing, pay the bills, and just do not know how they can take on the additional duties, responsibilities, and liabilities of sponsoring a pension plan.

I firmly believe that an increase in the number of people covered by pension plans will occur only when small employers have more substantial incentives to establish them. The pension provisions contained in the minimum wage amendment offered by Senator DOMENICI would provide more flexibility for small employers, relief from burdensome rules and regulations, and a tax incentive to start new plans for their employees. These reforms would create new retirement plans which would help thousands of workers build a secure retirement nest egg.

The amendment also contains provisions which promote new opportunities to roll over accounts from an old employer to a new employer. The lack of portability among plans is one of the weak links in our current pension system. This amendment contains technical improvements which will help ease the implementation of portability among the different types of defined contribution plans.

There has been criticism that the benefits of pension reform legislation would largely be directed toward the rich. However, to the contrary, evidence suggests that pension benefits largely benefit middle class workers. Over 75 percent of current workers participating in a pension plan have earnings of less than $50,000. Among married couples nearly 70 percent of those receiving a pension had incomes below $50,000. Among widows and widowers, over 55 percent of pension recipients had incomes below $25,000.

Furthermore, there are provisions in the amendment specifically designed to help rank-and-file workers earn meaningful benefits. Provisions such as reducing the vesting period for employer matching contributions in defined contribution plans and eliminating the twenty-five percent of compensation limit on combined employer and employee contributions to defined contribution plans.

Finally, let me say there is a precedent for including reforms to the employer provided pension system with an increase in the minimum wage. Three years ago we increased the minimum wage from $4.25 to $5.15 as part of the Small Business Job Protection Act of 1996. Included in that legislation were a number of reforms to the employer-provided pension system. One in particular, was the creation of the SIMPLE pension plan—which has expanded coverage to thousands of employees of small businesses who otherwise might not have been able to participate in a pension plan.

We have an opportunity to improve the incomes of the lowest paid members of the American labor market, and to improve retirement security for millions of workers and their families. I support my colleague's efforts, and encourage others to do the same.

Mr. BIDEN. Mr. President, I am pleased to join with my colleagues, Senator GRASSLEY and Senator TORRICELLI, in bringing bankruptcy reform legislation before the Senate today.

Senator GRASSLEY is the Senate's acknowledged leader on this issue, in every sense of the word. He has made reform of our bankruptcy code his cause, and he has stayed the course, through the last session of Congress and again this year, to bring us to where we are today.

It is evidence of Senator GRASSLEY's commitment that he has reached out to the ranking Democrat on his Subcommittee, Senator TORRICELLI, to join him in that effort. He certainly chose the right man for the job.

Senator TORRICELLI has worked with Senator GRASSLEY to bring the kind of balance to the bill before us today that marked last year's Senate floor a bill that was reported out of the Judiciary Committee by a bipartisan, 14-to-4 margin.

Last year, we brought to the floor a bill that passed the Senate 97 to 1—virtually unanimous agreement that our bankruptcy code needs reform, as well as consensus that reform must be fair.

I would like to address both of those points today, Mr. President—the need for reform, and the need for that reform to be balanced and equitable.

To a large extent, the numbers speak for themselves—the number of bankruptcy filings has exploded in recent years, reaching a record 1.4 million last year. That's on top of double-digit increases in the number of consumer bankruptcy filings for most of this decade. This record was set in a time of the best economic conditions our country has ever seen—the lowest persistent unemployment and inflation, the highest sustained growth, widespread income gains, and a booming stock market.

These are not the conditions that we normally associate with the kind of widespread financial distress that could trigger a wave of bankruptcy filings.

This tells me—and a lot of others, as well—that there is something wrong with the way our consumer bankruptcy code operates today. Simply put, too many people are finding it too easy too easy to walk away from their legitimate obligations by filing for bankruptcy. When that happens, somebody else pays the bill.

In the past year, a number different studies have looked at just how big that bill can be. These studies have been conducted by all sides in the debate, including the credit industry and the bankruptcy bar. The study conducted by the Department of Justice concluded that American businesses lose $3.2 billion annually to bankruptcies filed by individuals who have the capacity to repay their debts.

The size of the bankruptcy problem—both the number of filings and the dead-weight losses to our economy—was the foundation for last year's overwhelming Senate support for reform.

The principle behind the reforms we bring to the floor today is simple, Mr. President—if you file for the protection of bankruptcy, one basic question will be asked: do you have the ability to pay some of your bills, or not?

If the facts—looking at your income on the one hand, and the bills you have to pay on the other—show that you can pay, then you must file under Chapter 13, that requires a period of at least partial repayment before you are forgiven your remaining debts. Under such a Chapter 13 plan, you are not required to sell off major assets such as your house or your car.

If the facts show that you simply don't have the income to under take a Chapter 13 repayment plan, then the protection of Chapter 7 is still there for you. Chapter 7, however, requires that you sell off any significant assets, and the proceeds go to your creditors.

Most Americans would agree that this is fair, and would be surprised to find that no test of someone's ability to pay is required to get the protection of Chapter 7. But in fact, as even the strongest opponents of bankruptcy reform admit, today pretty much all the assumptions in the bankruptcy code are in favor of the filers, who can voluntarily choose a Chapter 7 liquidation or a Chapter 13 repayment plan.

The bill we bring to the floor today attempts to restore some balance to those assumptions, to require more responsibility on the part of those who seek the protection of bankruptcy.

But some of my colleagues will argue during this debate that the source of this problem is not really the operation of our bankruptcy laws, but what they call ''irresponsible'' lending. Creditors—especially the aggressive credit card companies—are pushing debt onto people, and that is what is driving people into bankruptcy.

Now, I am sure all of us are tired of those millions—actually billions—of credit card solicitations that come through the mail every year. But I ask my colleagues to reflect for a moment on what the alternative to widely available consumer credit would be.

When I first came to the Senate, we were fighting against lending practices that ''red-lined'' whole neighborhoods, Mr. President, in which banks would simply decide that some people were not worthy of credit, that they were incapable of managing their own affairs. A lot of us in Congress saw that as just plain wrong, and we worked to change it.

One of the things we did, in 1977, was to pass the Community Reinvestment Act, that requires banks to lend into local communities where incomes may be lower or the risks of repayment higher than bankers might prefer.

We just passed an historic overhaul of our country's banking laws. The Financial Services Modernization Act took many years of hard work to complete. Among the most contentious issues was the treatment of the Community Reinvestment Act.

In fact, President Clinton threatened a veto of that bill if the principles of the Community Reinvestment Act were not protected in the final deal. Those principles boil down to the idea that everyone deserves access to credit, and it is the policy of this country that banks must not unfairly restrict credit, despite what they think is the best way to maximize returns and minimize the risks on their loans.

Now, I am not here to argue that the flood of credit card solicitations is part of some new social program by the credit card companies. Of course they are trying to make money. By the way, it is also evidence of a lot of competition in the lending business, as well. But when I hear my colleagues argue about ''irresponsible lending,'' I hear echoes of those earlier debates about red-lining.

The ''democratization of credit,'' as some people have called it, has risks, of course. Some people will not use credit responsibly. But the alternative to widely available credit—passing laws to cut back on credit to the kinds of people we here in Washington have decided just can't be trusted to use it wisely—that alternative is far, far, worse, in my view.

Should we do more to make sure that consumers are fully informed, and that lenders disclose the full cost consumers pay for credit? Of course we should, Mr. President. During our Committee deliberations on this bill, we considered proposals by Senator SCHUMER that would have imposed requirements for more complete disclosure, in billing and in advertising, by creditors.

Because those issues are under the jurisdiction of the Banking Committee, we made the conscious decision to leave those provisions for an amendment here during the floor debate. That amendment will be among the first items of business on this bill.

Should we do more to make sure consumers are informed about how to handle debt, and how to avoid the ultimate step of bankruptcy? Of course we should, Mr. President. The bankruptcy reform bill before us today calls for new initiatives in those areas, as well. We look to the causes of bankruptcy as part of a comprehensive approach to reform.

But to try to stem the tide of bankruptcies by making credit harder to get, Mr. President, is a cure that will prove to be worse than the disease.

I thought one of the most important aspects of last years's Senate debate was how, as we attempt to reduce the number of bankruptcy filings, to still make sure that we continue to provide the full protection from creditors and the fresh start that many Americans will continue to require and deserve.

For many of my colleagues, particularly on my side of the aisle, that has been the real focus of the debate over bankruptcy reform, and it should be.

I know that many of my colleagues are concerned that the means test in this bill, that determines a bankruptcy filer's ability to pay, will be unfair to those who really need the full protection from creditors and the fresh start that Chapter 7 has historically provided. In fact, however, the means test is intended to ensure that a repayment plan—under Chapter 13—will be required only of those individuals who actually have the documented ability to continue to pay some of their legal obligations.

A range of studies from all sides in this debate has found that only 3 to 15 per cent of filers under the current system would be steered from the complete protection of Chapter 7 into Chapter 13, where they will be required to continue payments on—and, I have to stress, retain possession of—their credit purchases. The means test is designed to make sure that these new responsibilities will be required only of those who have the resources to meet them.

The managers' amendment that we will bring to the floor will provide additional refinements and safeguards to make sure the means test achieves that goal.

Another major concern that has been expressed by my colleagues is that bankruptcy reform will unfairly affect women and children, who may depend on family support payments—alimony, child support—that are all too often part of the picture in the financial and personal distress that can lead to bankruptcy. I want my colleagues to know just how much we have done to protect family support payments—to protect them much more than current law.

This bill will give alimony and child support payments the highest possible priority—over credit card companies, over department stores, over all other creditors—when the line forms to collect payments from someone who is in bankruptcy. This bill also requires that all alimony and child support must be paid in full before the final discharge of debts at the end of bankruptcy. These are just two of the significant improvements in the treatment of alimony and child support in this bill, and there are others.

The reform of our bankruptcy code is a complicated issue, and in the coming days we will be debating a lot of the thousands of important details that are involved. But if we keep our eye on the big picture—fundamental principles of fairness, responsibility, and effectiveness—I am convinced that this bill will enjoy overwhelming bipartisan support on final passage.

Mr. KYL. Mr. President, the Administrative Office of the U.S. Courts released a report in August that included some good news and some bad. On the one hand, the report indicated that bankruptcy filings for the 12-month period ending June 30, 1999 were down, albeit slightly—about 0.3 percent. On the other hand, it noted that the number of petitions filed still represented a 62.2 percent increase over the same period ending in 1995.

Extraordinary circumstances can strike anyone, which is why it is important to preserve access to bankruptcy relief. No one disputes that there should be an opportunity to seek relief and a fresh start when someone is struck by terrible circumstances beyond his or her control—for example, when families are torn apart by divorce or ill health. I suspect that creditors would be more than willing to work with someone when such tragedy strikes to help him or her through tough times.

But there is a good deal of evidence that too many people who file for relief under Chapter 7 actually have the ability to pay back some, or even all, of what they owe. Inappropriate use of Chapter 7, or straight bankruptcy, imposes higher costs on the vast majority of consumers who make good on their obligations. The Justice Department estimates these costs at about $3.2 billion annually. This phenomenon of bankruptcy for the sake of convenience—bankruptcy as a financial planning tool—is what led to the drafting of the bill before us today.

The Bankruptcy Reform Act, S. 625, is the product of a number of hearings, and months and months of deliberations. This bill has been in the legislative process for several years now. It enjoys broad bipartisan support, having been approved overwhelmingly by the Senate Judiciary Committee on a vote of 14 to 4. In fact, similar bipartisan legislation in the House of Representatives passed on May 5, by a lopsided vote of 313 to 108—an even greater margin than last year.

The bill would establish a presumption that a chapter 7 bankruptcy filing—what is generally known as straight bankruptcy—should be dismissed or should be converted to Chapter 13 if, after taking into account secured debts and priority debts like child support and living expenses, the debtor could repay 25 percent or more of his or her general unsecured debt, or $15,000, over a five-year period. The debtor could rebut the presumption by demonstrating special circumstances to show that he or she does not have a meaningful ability to repay his or her debts.

I suspect that most Americans would be surprised to find that this is not already the norm. At the moment, bankruptcy judges do not necessarily consider whether a debtor has a demonstrable capacity to repay his or her debts before granting Chapter 7 relief.

Studies suggest that this means test we propose here would force between three percent and 15 percent of debtors to pay more to creditors. This represents a relatively small number of debtors, but they are the ones who have the means to repay, and fairness dictates that they do so.

In short, the bill would steer individuals with the ability to repay some or all of their debts into Chapter 13 repayment plans, while preserving access to Chapter 7 for those who truly need its protection and the fresh start it would provide. This is a reasonable and balanced approach.

Remember, when people run up debts they have no intention of paying, they shift a greater financial burden onto honest, hard-working families in America. Estimates are that bankruptcy costs every American family more than $400 a year. Treasury Secretary Lawrence Summers acknowledged as much during a recent hearing before the Finance Committee. When asked whether debt discharged in bankruptcy results in higher prices for goods and services as businesses have to offset losses, here is what he said:

> Certainly there is a strong tendency in that direction, and also towards higher interest rates for other borrowers who are going to pay back their debt.

So when we hear opponents of the bill talk of their concern for consumers, let us remember the cost that the abuse of bankruptcy law imposes on the vast majority of consumers who responsibly abide by their obligations and pay back their debts. What we have here is really the most pro-consumer bill we will consider this year.

I want to share with Senators a very good editorial that appeared in the Tribune on May 24, 1999. I ask unanimous consent that the editorial be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PICKING UP THE TAB

It's quite possible you receive several solicitations a month for carpet-cleaning. But if you do, it's unlikely you have someone clean your carpets that often. You know when to say no.

It's also likely that you receive several credit card solicitations every month. But that doesn't mean you sign up for every card and then run out and charge the limit.

Or does it?

Consumer advocates seem to be of the opinion that Americans are all but helpless when credit card companies sing their siren song. That they are powerless to say no when the offers come in the mail or over the phone. And that when they get into financial trouble because of credit card debt, it's not really their fault.

That scenario is being played out more and more often these days, and soaring bankruptcy figures prove it. In 1980, three out of every 1,000 Arizona households sought protection under bankruptcy laws. In the supposedly booming year of 1998, that number had jumped to 14.

Credit card debt is often a major factor.

When people wiggle out of paying their debts, of course, someone else is left holding the bag—either their creditors, or the creditors' other customers, who have to fork over higher interest rates and fees to cover the loss.

Often bankruptcy is unavoidable. Loss of income, health problems and other calamities can quickly plunge even affluent families into hot water.

But often it is avoidable, and personal irresponsibility plays a part.

That's why Congress is considering legislation to tighten up bankruptcy laws so that people would be held more accountable for debts they incur. More people would be required to file under Chapter 13, which mandates repayment of certain debts, and fewer would be allowed to use Chapter 7, which is much easier on borrowers.

The House already has passed the legislation, with all six of Arizona's lawmakers voting for it.

Banks and credit card companies love the bill, of course. And some see a connection between big-business campaign contributions and the supposedly anti-consumer legislation.

But the bill, in truth, is not anti-consumer. At least it's not anti- the consumers who do pay their debts and who, because of higher interest rates, have to cover the tab for those who don't.

Nor does it wash to blame the companies for luring people into debt because of the incessant barrage of credit card solicitations. Yes, there are a lot of them. It's called advertising. In a capitalist, market economy, that's how companies make their products available. It can be annoying, but it's not wrong.

As with any product (beer, cigarettes, carpet-cleaning), it falls on the individual consumer to make responsible choices.

Those who don't should not expect the rest of us to clean up for the financial messes they themselves create.

Mr. KYL. I want to stop at this point and single out a few provisions of the bill for comment. These are provisions that I believe illustrate the deficiencies in current law—provisions that demonstrate why this legislation represents common sense reform of the bankruptcy system.

The first provision appears in Section 314 of the bill and provides that debts that are fraudulently incurred could no longer be discharged in Chapter 13—the same as in Chapter 7. Again, I think most Americans would be surprised to find out that this is not already the law.

Currently, at the conclusion of a Chapter 13 plan, a debtor is eligible for a broader discharge than is available in Chapter 7, and this superdischarge can result in several types of debts, including those for fraud and intentional torts, being discharged whereas they could not be discharged in Chapter 7. The language of the bill tracks an amendment I offered last year, and would simply add fraudulent debts to the list of debts that are nondischargeable under Chapter 13. It is as simple as that.

Here is what the Deputy Associate Attorney General, Francis M. Allegra, said about the dichargeability of fraudulent debts in a letter dated June 19, 1997:

We are unconvinced that providing a (fresh start) under Chapter 13 superdischarge to those who commit fraud or whose debts result from other forms of misconduct is desirable as a policy matter.

Here is what Judge Edith Jones of Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals said in a dissenting opinion to the report of the Bankruptcy Review Commission:

The superdischarge satisfies no justifiable social policy and only encourages the use of Chapter 13 by embezzlers, felons, and tax dodgers.

Judith Starr, the Assistant Chief of the Litigation Counsel Division of Enforcement of the Securities and Exchange Commission, testified before the House Judiciary Committee on March 18, 1998. Speaking about the fraud issue, she said:

We believe that, in enacting the Bankruptcy Code, Congress never intended to extend the privilege of the ''fresh start'' to those who lie, cheat, and steal from the public.

She goes on to say:

A fair consumer bankruptcy system should help honest but unfortunate debtors get their financial affairs back in order by providing benefits and protections that will help the honest to the exclusion of the dishonest, and not vice versa. It is an anomaly of the current system that bankruptcy is often more attractive to persons who commit fraud than to their innocent victims. Bankruptcy should not be a refuge for those who have committed intentional wrongs, nor should it encourage gamesmanship by failing to provide real consequences for abuse of its protections.

And she concludes:

We support [the provision of the House bill] which makes fraud debts nondischargeable in Chapter 13 cases. Inducements to file under Chapter 13 rather than Chapter 7 should be aimed at honest debtors, not at those who have committed fraud.

A final quotation: The Honorable Heidi Heitkamp, the Attorney General of North Dakota, testified to the following before the House Committee last year:

When a true ''bad actor'' is in the picture—a scam artist, a fraudulent telemarketer, a polluter who stubbornly refuses to clean up the mess he has created there is a real potential for bankruptcy to become a serious impediment to protecting our citizenry.

Furthermore, she says:

We must all be concerned because bankruptcy is, in many ways, a challenge to the normal structure of a civilized society. The economy functions based on the assumption that debts will be paid, that laws will be obeyed, that order to incur costs to comply with statutory obligations will be complied with, and that monetary penalties for failure to comply will apply and will ''sting.'' If those norms can be ignored with impunity, and with little or no future consequences for the debtor, this bodes poorly for the ability of society to continue to enforce those requirements.

Mr. President, I hope there will be no dissent to these anti-fraud provisions. Certainly, there should not be. Bankruptcy relief should be available to people who work hard and play by rules, yet fall unexpectedly upon hard times. Perpetrators of fraud should not be allowed to find safe haven in the bankruptcy code.

The second amendment I offered, which was included in last year's bill, and which is again in this year's bill, is also found in Section 314. It says that debts that are incurred to pay non-dischargeable debts are themselves non-dischargeable. In other words, if someone borrows money to pay a debt that cannot be erased in bankruptcy, that new debt could not be erased either. The idea is to prevent individuals from gaming the system and obtaining a discharge of debt that would otherwise be non-dischargeable.

I want to emphasize that we have taken special care to ensure that debts incurred to pay non-dischargeable debts will not compete with non-dischargeable child- or family-support in a post-bankruptcy environment.

The third amendment of mine is reflected in Section 310 of the bill, and it is intended to discourage people from running up large debts on the eve of bankruptcy, particularly when they have no ability or intention of making good on their obligations.

Current law effectively gives unscrupulous debtors a green light to run up their credit cards just before filing for bankruptcy, knowing they will never be liable for the charges they are incurring. That is wrong, and it has got to stop.

The provision would establish a presumption that consumer debt run up on the eve of bankruptcy is non-dischargeable. The provision is not self-executing. In other words, it would still require that a lawsuit be brought by the creditor against the debtor so that a bankruptcy judge could consider the circumstances and assess the claim. But if this provision achieves the intended purpose, debtors will not only minimize the run-up of additional debt, they will have more money available after bankruptcy to pay priority obligations, including alimony and child support.

Again, special care has been taken to ensure that we are only talking about consumer debts incurred within 90 days of bankruptcy for goods or services that are not necessary for the maintenance or support of the debtor or dependent child. We want to be sure that family obligations are met.

I will discuss one other aspect of the bill before closing, and that relates to the many provisions that Senators HATCH, GRASSLEY, and I crafted last year—and which have been improved on in this year's bill—to protect the interests of women and children.

Nothing in the earlier versions of the bill reduced the priority of, or any of the protections that are accorded to, child-support and alimony under current law. Nevertheless, concerns were expressed that provisions of the legislation might indirectly or even inadvertently affect ex-spouses and children of divorce. Assuming that critics were operating in good faith—and because our intent was always to ensure that family obligations were met first—Senators HATCH, GRASSLEY, and I crafted an amendment last year to remove any doubt whatsoever about whether women and children come first.

As now written, the bill elevates the priority of child-support from its current number seven on the priority list for purposes of payment to number one. Our amendment mandates that all child support and alimony be paid before all other obligations in a Chapter 13 plan. It conditions both confirmation and discharge of a Chapter 13 plan upon complete payment of all child support and alimony that is due before and after the bankruptcy petition is filed. It helps women and children reach exempt property and collect support payments notwithstanding contrary federal or state law. And it extends the protection accorded an ex-spouse by making almost all obligations one ex-spouse owes to the other non-dischargeable.

Many of us have heard the argument by opponents of this bill that women and children will be forced to compete with credit-card companies to collect resources from debtors, particularly once they emerge from bankruptcy. The provisions I just described answer that concern. Moreover, I think it is important to point out that the post-discharge debtor generally does not have the option to pay a credit-card company before his or her former spouse anyway. More and more child support is withheld from wages by the state. In other words, child support obligations are paid before the non-custodial parent or former spouse ever receives his or her paycheck. If withholding is not in place when the bankruptcy is filed, it can be put in place quickly under other provisions of the pending bill.

If any of these provisions can be improved on further, I know that Senators HATCH and GRASSLEY, and myself would be more than willing to modify them. My concern is that we do not allow concern for women and children to become an excuse for opposing the broader bill and letting other debtors off the hook for debts they are able to repay. That would only hurt women and children in need by forcing them to bear the higher costs associated with such bankruptcy abuse.

Mr. President, this is a good bill—a bill that protects debtors who truly need relief, while also protecting the interests of consumers who meet their obligations to creditors by repaying their debts. It protects the interests of women and children through a series of new provisions. I hope my colleagues will join me in voting for this fair and balanced piece of legislation.

I yield the floor.

Mr. HARKIN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa.

Mr. HARKIN. Mr. President, parliamentary inquiry.

First of all, under what order are we operating? Is there a time limit on remarks?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is a time limit. The minority had 1 minute 20 seconds.

Mr. HARKIN. Further parliamentary inquiry.

Once that time is exhausted, what business will transpire, then, on the floor of the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Further amendments to the bill can be called up by unanimous consent.

Mr. HARKIN. Mr. President, I yield myself the—what is it?—1 minute 20 seconds and ask unanimous consent that I be permitted to speak for an additional 9 minutes, and it not be taken off the majority's time.

Mr. SCHUMER. Reserving the right to object, and I will not object, but I have just worked out a unanimous consent request with the Senator from Iowa about laying down some amendments on the bill. Might I do that now?

Mr. HARKIN. How much time does the Senator intend to take in laying down the amendments?

Mr. SCHUMER. About 15 seconds for me to ask unanimous consent to offer them and then lay them aside.

Mr. HARKIN. I yield my right to the floor, Mr. President, for the unanimous consent that the Senator from New York be allowed to lay down his amendments. And at the expiration of that time, I ask unanimous consent that I be recognized again for the minute 20 seconds, plus 9 additional minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SCHUMER. I ask unanimous consent that the amendments be laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SCHUMER. I yield the floor to the Senator from Iowa.

AMENDMENT NO. 2751

Mr. HARKIN. Mr. President. When I think of who the minimum wage increase would benefit and why it is needed—I don't think of the teenager popping corn at the movie theater.

I think of the single mother of two, a full-time cashier at the local grocery store, struggling to put dinner on the table and clothe her kids. She's off welfare, but still living far below the poverty level. Right now, the minimum wage pays her less than $11,000 a year, working 40 hours a week.

If we really want to help parent succeed on their own, they need a fair wage. Senator KENNEDY'S amendment would help us get there.

Today we have the opportunity to assure that 11.8 million American workers are provided with a much needed and much deserved raise. Two-thirds of minimum wage workers are adults. Nearly sixty percent are women. More than ⅓ are the sole breadwinners, like the woman I spoke of.

Mr. President, it is a sad fact that in today's booming economy and skyrocketing executive pay, minimum wage workers earn 19 percent less, adjusted for inflation, than minimum wage workers earned 20 years ago. The proposed increased would restore the wage floor to just above its 1983 level—which is a positive step despite the fact that it would still be 13 percent below its 1979 peak.

I believe that these workers are central to the U.S. economy and that they should benefit from the recent surge in economic growth—not be left behind.

But, I keep hearing the same tired argument echo in this chamber—that raising the minimum wage would cause widespread job loss. Critics need to find another argument—because they're wrong on this one—always have been.

Let's look at what happened last time: The Economic Policy Institute reported that in September 1996, one month before the minimum wage increased from $4.25 to $4.75, the national unemployment rate was 5.2 percent. In December 1997, two months after the second annual increase boosted the minimum wage to $5.15, the national unemployment rate was 4.2 percent—a full point lower. More telling, retail trade jobs which disproportionately employ low wage workers, grew as fast as jobs overall.

A recent Business Week editorial backed that up saying—

In a fast-growth, low-inflation economy, higher minimum wages raise income, not unemployment.

The workers who this amendment would target are central to the economy—and they should benefit from the incredible growth of our economy.

I know that there are proposals for a more gradual increase in the minimum wage—3 years instead of 2. This would cut the income of a full-time, year-around worker roughly $1,500 over three years compared with the current proposal. The minimum wage has already lost a lot of ground with inflation. The three-year proposal would only hinder this effort to catch up.

There is another critical piece of Senator KENNEDY's amendment—stopping the abuse of workers on U.S. land. It would apply the U.S. minimum wage to the Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands—the CNMI, also known as Saipan. The local government's current minimum wage there is $3.10 an hour. This amendment would go a long way toward relieving some of the egregious abuse and exploitation of temporary foreign workers brought to the U.S. territory to work at the garment factories—most of which are owned by foreign interests.

The bottom line is this: All of America deserves a raise—that includes those living and working in Saipan—and the 143,000 Iowans who would benefit from the raise.

Profits and productivity are way up. There is room to give workers a wage they deserve without hurting economic growth. The rest of the economy shouldn't be doing better than the people who make it run.

So I urge my colleagues to support a raise in the minimum wage. It is the right thing to do for women, for America's families, and it is long overdue.

The Kennedy amendment also includes a number of very important tax provisions that I strongly support. One of the most important points about the tax provisions is that the new tax benefits are fully paid for. The cost of these benefits are offset both for the coming year and for the coming ten years so we do not eat into the funds we need to pay for Social Security and needed improvements in Medicare as the baby boomers start retiring. It closes tax loopholes that allow some large companies to escape paying their fair share of taxes by creating artificial accounting gimmicks that have no purpose whatsoever except shifting the burden of taxes from a company to average taxpayers or the public debt.

I am very pleased that this amendment includes the text of S. 1300, the Older Workers Protection Act, which I have sponsored. Across America, workers have worked for companies anticipating the secure retirement which is their due and expectation under their company's pension plan. Now, as more Americans than ever before in history approach retirement, some employers are trying to cut their pension benefits.

Under current law, a company cannot take away pension benefits that have already been earned. But, in a slight of hand, when some companies change their pension plan making it less generous, they quietly, simply do not pay anything into an employee's account, often for 5 years or more till the employee's pension is ''worn away'' to the lower value of the new plan. This wear away is, I believe illegal under current age discrimination law. It certainly is a violation of the spirit of the law. This provision would clear, real protections for many thousands of workers who are having their pensions slashed without their knowledge. This measure eliminates wear away. It provides a company must pay into an employee's pension account under a new pension plan without regard to higher accrued benefits that might have been earned prior to plan change.

The amendment also provides for numerous provisions that help smaller businesses and their owners that I support. These include:

100 percent deductibility for self-employed health insurance staring on January 1, that I have been working for many years,

A tax credit for the start up costs of a small company pension plan including a 50 percent credit for the match that a small employer puts into a employee's account during the first 5 years. This could really make a difference; giving employers real incentives to setting up quality pension plans so crucial to workers retirement, a 25 percent tax credit for an employer's cost in setting up a day care center, Expanding the amount a small business can expanse to 25,000, Extension of the Work Opportunity Tax Credit and the related to Work Tax Credit, Expanding the Low Income Housing Tax Credit. But, I would have liked to see a far faster increase in the increase in this program than the amendment provided. The measure contains a number of benefits of particular interest to farmers that I strongly support including a provision that prevents the use of income averaging pushing a farmer into having to pay the Alternative Minimum tax. And it provides for a 10 year carryback for farmers that I have been advocating. This would I believe it would be important to have the carryback provision take effect for loses that occurred in both 1998 and 1999.

On the other hand, the Republican tax amendment has a net cost of over $75 billion over the coming decade that is not offset by closing tax loop holes or by other means. That means that the Republican proposal will have the likely effect of cutting into the funds we need to protect Social Security and to preserve and improve Medicare. That is a real problem under current projections of government revenues and costs. But it is even worse if we end up with a serious downturn in our economy. Some claim that the reason for these tax provisions is a desire to mitigate the costs of the minimum wage increase on small employers. But, the burden on Social Security and Medicare is three times the effect of the estimated effect of the version of the minimum wage provisions in the Majority package.

Many of the provisions are worthy of support, many are also in the Democratic proposal where they are paid for. It also contains some provisions that I support but which were not included in the Democratic proposal because of its cost. These include the tax benefits for health insurance and long term care. On the other hand, this proposal unfairly benefits the wealthy. For example, there is a $396 million cost to the government over 10 years to allow a person to increase the amount of money that can be received from a defined benefit plan from $130,000 to $160,000 per year. Every penny of this cost benefits those at the top of the income scale, not one of whom is making less than 10 times the minimum wage just from one retirement benefit!

Unfortunately, there are a large number of provisions in the GOP plan that reduce the incentive for small businesses to set up a good pension plan for their workers. The tax code provides about $130 billion a year in tax benefits to promote pensions. The purpose of that considerable public investment is to provide incentives for people to invest in pensions and for companies to fund pension plans for all of their workers, not just owners and key employees. Many small employers are pushed by the law's limits on what they can put into their own pension accounts without providing benefits to all employees to provide decent pension plans for their workers. The majority amendment reduces those restraints and will likely result in far fewer employees getting pensions. That is bad public policy.

Lastly, the majority amendment includes provisions that provides significant special interest loopholes in the tax code. There is a provision regarding ESOPs: employee stock ownership plans. The Treasury believes this provision opens up a significant loophole for some taxpayers. If a high income self employed person or someone in a partnership with others, arranges that all of the people that work with him and his partners are considered employees of another entity, then the partners can incorporate and form an ESOP. Under the provision in the amendment, the doctors could then defer all of the income they desire, effectively as pension income without any limit. So, if they each make $300,000 and one decides that he needs to spend only $150,000 to live on, that high income taxpayer could defer their taxes on the whole whopping $150,000 unspent. That is outrageous. Why should we be putting these very generous loopholes in the tax code that allow a few to not pay their fair share of taxes? They become a special class of taxpayers who only have to pay taxes on what they spend and everything they save goes into the equivalent of a super IRA with all taxes deferred. That makes no sense at all.

We need tax provisions that are designed to promote the creation of pensions for the average employee making $25,000 or $50,000, not creating special provisions only of interest to very high income taxpayers that actually reduce their interest in setting up pension plans for their workers. I urge that we pass the Kennedy amendment and reject the majority amendment.

Mr. DOMENICI addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President do I have some additional time?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Thirty-two minutes 24 seconds remaining.

Mr. DOMENICI. I note Senator LANDRIEU is here from Louisiana. I won't take that much time, and I will yield back the remainder so she may proceed in morning business, if that is her desire.

Let me just say, it is absolutely amazing that some group proposes that the minimum wage should be increased because the poor families in America, who are out there working at jobs, are the ones it will help, only to find that every study reveals that isn't the case.

I am going to talk a minute about CNN. They proceeded with a very intense analysis of their own, and they have been running it on television. It is sort of shocking to hear what they find versus what we are hearing in justification of a $1 increase in the minimum wage in the next 13 months-14 months.

First, let me start and read the dialog that occurred on CNN with reference to their research and who is helped and not helped by the minimum wage:

Highlight: Next week, Congress will be raising the minimum wage by $1 to $6.15, which could benefit perhaps 10 million low-wage workers. A look at who a minimum wage increase would benefit. Body of the report: Jim Moret, anchor. There were fewer Americans out of work last month. The jobless rate dropped to 4.1 percent, the lowest it has been in 3 decades. Also in the Labor Department's report, average hourly earnings rose by only 1 penny last month to $13.37. That is the average per hour. Next week, Congress considers a minmimum wage of $1 which could benefit perhaps those 10 million low-wage workers.

But who are they?

Our Brooks Jackson has some answers that may surprise you.

He says:

Who would be helped if the minimum wage went up to $6.15 cents?

The answer is:

Not these workers.

The ones they have been talking about.

Bob Seidner, owner, Classic Auto Salon: I wouldn't even consider paying somebody that level, because we're not going to get the level of employee.

Jackson: In today's hot job market, Bob Seidner says he has to pay $8 an hour to get an experienced car washer in Maryland. And in his Atlanta restaurant, nobody stays at the minimum wage for long.

They all move up rather rapidly.

Greg Vojnovic, Restaurant owner: If you look at the economy today, there is so much pressure on the labor marketplace that you can't pay anybody a minimum wage for any period of time. Our typical dishwasher, who is typically the lowest position, is making [more than the minimum wage today. In fact, he is making] $7 an hour.

Jackson: So who would be helped? Experts say fewer than one worker out of every ten, most of them part-time workers, and mostly not in poverty.

Let me repeat that:

So who would be helped? One out of every ten, and most of them are part-time workers and mostly not in poverty.

I am going to jump away from this for a minute and say, who do you think those part-time workers are? They are the teenagers of America who are working in restaurants, drive-ins, and all the kinds of places where they want to get jobs to learn how to work. Let's be honest about it; it would be nice if we could give them a 50-cent increase in the minimum wage in January and 50 cents the next year. But let's also be honest that they are not the poverty people of America; they are teenagers breaking in at their new job. And it is most interesting, for these comments and others that I have read say that even they are getting paid more than the minimum wage these days.

Teenagers like Sara Schroff, a 19-year-old student making $5.15, but only the start. She'll be promoted in a week.

Even McDonald's offers more than the minimum wage.

Says another who has looked out in the job market.

In fact, teenagers make up 28 percent of those who would gain, and only 23 percent of the gainers are the main earners in their families.

Opponents say there's still a good reason to raise the minimum wage.

And the Economic Policy Institute says:

It's true that while the increase is not perfectly targeted, most of the benefits do go to lower-income working families. Fifty percent of the benefits, of the gains from this next increase, will go to families whose income is $25,000 or less; that's lower middle income. . . .

Those working poor households would get only 17 percent of the gain from raising the minimum wage.

Frankly, we have heard all kinds of numbers on how many minimum-wage people we have in America. I am just going to be rebutting their comments for a moment, and then I will tell Americans about our bill.

To get to the 10 million they are bantering around here on the floor, let me tell you where that comes from. Minimum-wage earners are 1.6 million of this 10 million that is being bantered around. Workers making between the present minimum wage and the new wage of $6.15, under these amendments, are 5.9 million. Workers making less than the minimum wage and who are not going to be affected by the minimum wage because they are tip people, or the like, are 2.7.

So, in summary, 1.6 million are really minimum-wage earners working under the minimum wage as a means of recompense for an hour's work. Nonetheless, we have an amendment that I believe is far superior to the Democrat amendment. I am very pleased to have been part of putting it together. We want to raise the minimum wage to keep steadily ahead of inflation, and it will be raised 30 cents in January, 35 cents the following January, and 30 cents the following—$1 in a period of 26 months instead of a period of 14 months.

In addition, very simply put, we change some provisions in the tax law, which I now hear we should not do because it cuts taxes. Well, does anyone seriously believe that with the kind of surpluses we have projected in the United States, we are not going to give the taxpayers back some of that money? I can say, with surpluses that are approaching $3.4 trillion, does anybody believe there is a better time to give the American people a tax reduction, give them back some of their money? If we can't do that now, I ask you, when can we? These are the largest deficit, largest surpluses we could have predicted in the best of times.

The budget is under control. It is growing at the lowest rate in all categories in the past 40 years on an annual basis. We take some credit for that. The President deserves some credit for that. But that is success. That is building a surplus. In the last year, we have not spent one penny of the Social Security trust fund money—in the year that just passed. The Congressional Budget Office says, as a matter of fact, we have a surplus of a billion dollars. That has not occurred in 40 years. We want to say to the Social Security trust fund, you keep all that is yours. That is about $2 trillion. What do we do with the other $1.3 trillion to $1.4 trillion? Do we leave it around here so we can spend it?

Does anybody doubt, if we don't make appropriate tax cuts, or tax reductions, that it won't be spent? We have already heard that the worst thing to do with the surplus is to spend it. The best economic advisers that our country has say the worst thing you can do is spend it. So we have, in the first 5 years, $18.5 billion in tax relief, mostly for small businesses so they can continue to be the driving force behind America's growth.

I am going to just quickly, in a moment, tick off three or four of those tax proposals that I think are very good. Somebody said this is a waste of effort because if the Republican package passes—and I hope it does because I think it is a very good package—the President will just veto it. Well, I am not too sure of that. Let me make sure the Senate understands that the tax package included in this Domenici, et al., proposal is 12.5 percent of the tax package we passed some months ago. It is 12.5 percent—not 50 percent of it, not 75, but 12.5. If you can't get that through, what can you get through? I believe the President would sign it in a minute because it does the kinds of things that even he has talked about as being necessary for American business to retain its energizing effect and its competitive qualities.

For a moment, let's quickly go through the amendments we have attached and put in the tax amendments in this package.

One: For the first time, we really help workers in America pay for health care insurance. Heretofore, if a worker bought his own insurance, he could not deduct it. He would have to put it in a large pot called health expenditures.

Only if it exceeds 7.5 of his income could it be included in the deduction. We have said let's try this out. Let's see what would happen if workers who buy their own health insurance—for whatever reason—deducted the whole thing the same as a company today deducts the whole thing under an exclusionary rule that we have established by precedent around here, and then we made it part of the rule of law. That is in there.

Self-employed men and women have had a raw deal on health insurance. Everybody in this Chamber knows it. If we have a surplus, we ought to make that right. Let self-employed Americans deduct 100 percent of their insurance costs—not some percentage. That is built in with a rather rapid curve where they will be able to deduct the full amount.

This is a work opportunity tax credit. Almost everybody in this Senate wanted that when we put it in before and made it temporary. It runs along with welfare reform. We have reduced welfare by 48 percent, and we cry out to business to hire welfare trainees. Yet the credit they get for doing that is temporary. We want to make it permanent. So a welfare trainee is more apt to get a job if the employer can get some incentives up front while they are training them and helping them.

Who can be against that? Will the President veto that? I can't believe it.

There is an item where small business can do an expensing of certain capital improvements. But we have a limit on it. Otherwise they have to depreciate it over time. We have increased that to $30,000 a year. It will be marvelous for small business to deduct those kinds of expenses that are encapsulated in that amendment. It will make their businesses grow and prosper. There are two or three others that go with this.

But essentially, I believe when you put that package together you are saying there will be fewer minimum-wage workers in the future, small business will have a chance to profit more, and they will pay higher wages because the marketplace will force them to. In the meantime, we also increase minimum wage by $1. We just take 12 months longer to do it.

I believe it is a good package. I hope the Senate passes it tomorrow. We will have a few more minutes of debate tomorrow before the vote. In the meantime, I hope everyone looks at the package in their offices and will get briefed on it because it is a very good package. I not only yield the floor, but I yield back any time that I had on my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Senator from Louisiana.

THE LAND AND WATER CONSERVATION FUND

Ms. LANDRIEU. Thank you, Mr. President. I have a few important things to say tonight. I will try to fit that in with the time that has been allotted to me.

There are many important issues that need to be resolved in the next few days in order for us to wrap up this year and move on. The minimum wage debate is clearly a very significant issue for us. I am glad we will be voting on it and, hopefully, come to a resolution tomorrow. There are other issues pending that have yet to be resolved. That is why I rise tonight to speak for a few minutes about one of them that is very important to the people of my State, the State of Louisiana.

I say at the outset as respectfully as I can that I am going to object to proceeding to any additional actions of the Senate until this issue is resolved, or until there is an answer in terms of what our options are. Some of us are not party to some of the discussions that are going on behind closed doors and some being reported. There is some information that I am very interested in receiving, and many people in Louisiana are interested in the information because it has to do with money that our State is producing. It has to do with the kinds of investments we are either going to make or not make to the environment of our Nation, to the coast of Louisiana, which is critical to preserve and help restore that coastline.

It is a very important issue to the American people in terms of our opportunity to use a small percentage of the non-Social Security surplus to invest in the Land and Water Conservation Fund to fully fund it, to invest in some extraordinarily successful wildlife conservation programs, to invest in historic preservation, and to invest in coastal restoration and impact assistance for States that produce oil and gas and for States that do not.

This is an issue that we have now been debating actually for many years. This debate has gone on for 30 years in terms of funding for land and water. It has gone on for over 50 years in terms of what percentage would be fair for Louisiana, the producing State, to receive. Texas is in that position. Mississippi is in that position to a certain degree. Alaska could be in that position. So there are a few States that are producing States. This debate has raged on, in my opinion, for too long.

In my opinion, there is broad bipartisan support for a concept that would take a portion of these revenues. They are estimated to be about $3 billion a year; $120 billion has been generated off the coast in offshore oil and gas production in taxes that the companies are already paying and many continue to pay. These are not new taxes. These are not new revenues. These are revenues that are coming into the Federal Treasury. There is bipartisan support for taking a portion of those revenues and investing in the things that I have just outlined.

Let me tell you why it is important for me to respectfully object to moving on to any further business.

I know that I am going to be the skunk at the garden party because Louisiana is not a huge State such as California or Texas or Illinois. We have a small delegation.

Sometimes, because our numbers are smaller, we aren't able to get all the attention I think we need and the people of our State deserve. Fortunately, the rules of the Senate allow each Senator to be able to speak at length, to be able to express their will and their opinion. As respectfully as I can, I am going to object to any further business until some of these things can be resolved.

Let me begin by telling a story that is not well known. I think Americans are very interested judging from all of the correspondence my office has received over the last year and a half from thousands of individuals and groups who seem to be very sympathetic about this issue.

Let me read from a brochure called ''Coast 2050,'' discussing sustaining coastal Louisiana. I will read a few pages that tell a story about a great and mighty river.

At the end of Old Man River, the mighty Mississippi, lies the largest expanse of coastal wetlands in North America. This dynamic and bountiful landscape was literally built and sustained by the sediment-laden waters that drain to the river from 31 states and three Canadian provinces.

This is not a river that just drains a few States. This is a river that drains our entire Nation. The economy of our Nation depends on the taming of this river and this ecosystem. The future of our Nation depends on how well we manage the resources of this great river.

The Louisiana coast is home to 2 million Americans. The wetlands, bays, and islands of the coast constitute an enormously productive ecosystem and resource base that support the livelihood and well-being of the Nation. The statistics are awesome: the ecosystem contributes nearly 30 percent by weight of the total commercial fisheries harvest in the lower 48 states and provides overwintering habitat for 70 percent of the migratory waterfowl using the Central and Mississippi Flyways; 18 percent of U.S. oil production and 24 percent of U.S. gas production * * * Louisiana's ports rank first in the Nation in total shipping tonnage.

Again, not a river that just serves Louisiana or serves Mississippi but a river that serves the entire Nation. It would be all for naught for the Midwestern States to produce any agricultural product if they couldn't get it to market. That is the great benefit and strength of this Mississippi River—and we sit at the mouth—in terms of the transport of goods for hundreds of years.

The unique human culture and beautiful setting of southern Louisiana is world-renowned.

We are losing it at an enormous and frightening rate. Since 1930, Louisiana has lost over 1,500 square miles of marsh. The State is still losing 25 to 30 square miles each year, nearly a football field of prime wetlands every 30 minutes. Environmentalists should be alarmed.

There are great needs in California, the West, and in the Everglades, but there is a tremendous need that should call us to arms, call citizens to action, to help preserve and restore the south Louisiana coast and this tremendous ecosystem not just for the benefit of Louisiana and the 4 million people who live in our State but for the benefit of the 260-plus million population of this Nation.

There is no one reason for this land loss. Some of our coastal wetlands have always been subsiding, but in the past the river built and sustained the wetlands and built new ones, which offset the natural losses.

Since Europeans came to Louisiana, we have been building levees to protect against the floods. Levees keep homes, businesses, and farms safe, but they prevent the sediments from flooding to refurbish the marsh. In addition, levees were built to tame the route and flow of the Mississippi River to allow for the great transport and trade on which this Nation is dependent to grow and prosper. Canals were dug through the marshes to promote navigation and to recover petroleum resources that have helped fuel this Nation, to turn the lights on, to run our machinery, to run our factories.

We are happy to make that contribution, and we are trying to do it in a more environmentally sensitive way. This ecosystem supports a tremendous amount of commerce, and I don't think I should have to explain it much more. However, we are losing it.

Today, Louisiana has 3,800 square miles of marsh and over 800 square miles of swamp. Even at the current pace of restoration efforts—which have been, by the way, successful, albeit minimal because we don't have the financial resources that we deserve, that we should get for this restoration—we will lose more than 600 square miles of marsh and almost 400 square miles of swamp by the year 2050 if we do not take action. Consequently, nearly 1,000 square miles of Louisiana wetlands will become open water. The Nation will lose an area the size of the State of Rhode Island if we fail to act.

That is why I come to the floor tonight to speak about this issue. I know some colleagues think perhaps there is nothing we can do or we just can't make this happen. I am compelled to speak again because of this story, because of this great resource, and because I know what the serious consequences will be for my State and for the entire Nation if there is no solution. It is not a difficult solution. It is not even an expensive solution. It is a real solution that has been laid on the table in this Congress.

If we do nothing, we face significant reductions in the $20 billion-per-year shipping and export industry in addition to our ports, our commercial fisheries, and oil and gas, and leave ourselves open to serious hurricane damage.

There is a consensus about what we can do. We have learned two things: We already know how to fix most of the problems; second, coastal recovery will require much more effort than has been undertaken so far. We know what it will take to fix the problem. We just need to get the job done. That is why I am here tonight to try to get this job done because it is most certainly something that is within our grasp.

I want to read for the record a letter from over 800 environmental organizations circulated last week. I want to take the time to read it. It is a good letter using good common sense that is within the grasp of the Interior appropriations bill that is now being debated. We have the opportunity to make this happen. Without adding any new money, we can make this happen.

As the 20th century draws to a close, Congress has a rare opportunity to pass landmark legislation that would establish a permanent and significant source of conservation funding. A number of promising legislative proposals will take revenue from nonrenewable offshore oil and gas resources and reinvest them in the protection of renewable resources such as wildlife, public lands, our coast, our oceans, our cultural resources, historic preservation, and outdoor recreation. Securing this funding would allow us to build upon the pioneering conservation tradition that Teddy Roosevelt initiated at the beginning of this century. The vast majority of Americans recognize the duty we have to protect and conserve our rich cultural and natural legacies for future generations, a diverse array of interests including sports men and women, conservationists, historic preservationists, outdoor recreationists, the faith community, the business community, State and local governments. Over 40 Governors, Democrat and Republican, have supported this initiative, and they support conservation funding for this legislation because they recognize it is our obligation to make these commitments for future generations.

So this letter goes on to call on our body here, the Senate and the House, to:

* * * seize this unprecedented opportunity to pass legislation that would make a substantial and reliable investment in the conservation of our Nation's wildlife, public lands, coastal and marine resources, historic treasures, urban and rural parks, open spaces * * * design a bill that provides significant conservation benefits free of harmful environmental impacts to our coastal and ocean resources, and one that does not unduly hinder land acquisition programs.

We have this within our grasp.

It says:

We look to Congress to make this a reality.

I hope, as I slow down this process, perhaps we can get some answers from the White House, from the negotiators, about the real possibilities of this taking place. There are some on the right who say we do not need any more public land. There are some on the left who say if we do anything that might encourage drilling, no matter how great the benefits, we are not for it.

Let me say, in a markup that is being done, hopefully this Wednesday in the House, many of those criticisms will be put to rest. In the markup that is being considered on the House side on this bill, there are no incentives for oil and gas drilling. We can fight that battle another day. There is an incentive and language that will help us spend this money for coastal restoration in ways that are environmentally sensitive and that do not encourage drilling. There is language, on the other hand, that is going to suggest that Congress has a legitimate role to play in the purchasing of lands, along with the administration—whether it is this administration, President Clinton, or whether it is a future President—that it is right that this Congress and the President would make decisions about the purchases of land, how much, and when, and where.

Those differences could be worked out. So there is bipartisan agreement we should take a portion of these revenues.

I want to show a graph, because people think, Why does Mary keep speaking about this issue over and over again? It is because the revenues that are being considered for this come from basically one State. I know you would be able to guess what that State is. This is Louisiana. I know this is a very small sheet, but I think the camera can pick this up. This red represents the contribution Louisiana makes to offshore oil and gas revenues which totaled, in this particular year, $4.8 billion. The average is about $3.5 billion. But Louisiana contributes over 90 percent.

When we talk about taking this money and funding programs I have outlined—and I am for all the things I have just suggested—we need to be fair to the producing States. Louisiana produces the most, then Texas; Mississippi contributes; Alabama is a contributor. Of course, California did contribute. There is a moratorium there. This bill does nothing to upset that political decision, but it does save, for the States that are producing, a portion.

Let me talk about a portion because I believe in fighting for your State. But I also believe in being fair. If I did not think my State was correct, I would be the first one to stand up and say we should do it another way; we simply do not have an argument. But it is widely known the interior States in our Nation get to keep 50 percent of the revenues they produce. States such as Wyoming and New Mexico get to keep 50 percent of their revenues, and they can spend it basically as they wish, with few restrictions.

I am not coming to this body, nor have I introduced a bill, to give Louisiana 50 percent of this offshore oil and gas revenues. It is not on our land, but it is right outside of our coast. If it were not for our land, this industry simply would not exist. Very few can dispute that because I don't know where you would launch the helicopters, Honduras or Guatemala; or where you would build the machinery, the canals, the barges, the railroads, or highways that allow this industry to exist. I do not know if a good option would be Honduras or Guatemala, but if you don't do it from the coast of Louisiana, Mississippi, and Texas, you do not have many options.

But I did not come here to ask for 50 percent. I am asking the President and the administration and this Congress to give Louisiana not even 30 percent. I am not even asking for 25 percent. I have simply said to the producing and coastal States, let us keep at least 10 percent of the dollars for Louisiana and the producing States, and share with all the other coastal States, whether they produce or not, to give them moneys from this source of revenue because it does not just belong to us, it belongs to everyone.

But surely we should, since we produce 90 percent of the money, get a fair share as we try to distribute this money. Whether we do it for 1 year—we have been doing sort of hit or miss over the last 30—or whether we try to take the step and do it permanently, recognizing the needs and legitimate concerns of the Western States and some others that are concerned about purchasing land—then clearly Louisiana deserves its fair share. So do the other coastal States.

For the record, we have produced over $120 billion since 1955 and have received less than 1 percent. I guess that is worth it, to me, to be a skunk at the garden party, because it is just not fair. One of the things about the Senate and about Congress and about this whole body, and about America and the debate, is trying to pass legislation the American people care about. The American people can understand fairness. Whether they are from a Western State or California or Washington, or from a Southern State, I think they would say: Senator LANDRIEU, you are correct. It is not fair for your State to produce 90 percent and get virtually nothing when we have a bill that will share this with everyone and do something the American people want to do.

Let me talk about that for just a minute. Sometimes we come to Washington and I think we have the tendency to forget, or maybe just temporarily lose our memory, about some of the things we promised to do when we came. Sometimes we get busy with the talk in Washington and we forget about what the talk at home is.

There was research done just recently, in fact a couple of months ago, by Luntz Research Companies, one of the foremost pollsters in America. He said some things that really brought this issue home to me. Even though I knew this was important to people, I frankly did not think to take a survey which would have been a good thing, but the environmental groups did. The results are staggering.

I am just going to read the overview:

What matters to Americans most these days is ''quality of life'' and ''peace of mind.'' Our nation's prosperity has brought with it the need both to think beyond simple hand-to-mouth economics and to address the anxieties posed by perceived threats to our own health and safety. The public's mood on the environment speaks to the opportunity to deliver positively on a rising public priority.

More than 50% of Americans tell us they will head to the outdoors on vacation this year. What they expect to find when they get there is part of the legacy they most want to pass along to the next generation.

There is an emotional intensity to issues that define the legacy of what this generation will leave to the next. At the turn of the Millennium—as we enter the 21st Century focused more than ever on the future and rapid change—what drives people's attitudes on protecting the great outdoors may be the need to identify and carry with us those defining ideas and principles that have made America the great pioneer.

To deliver on the call for preservation and progress, policymakers can succeed by focusing more on the benefits the public wants and expects and by spending less time talking about the process that the public really doesn't care to follow in a debate.

And no issue speaks more directly to Americans' environmental ''quality of life'' than their ability to enjoy open spaces, parks, and wilderness areas. Whether they want a place to visit alone or with their families on vacation—or just having the peace of mind that those places will still exist (for themselves, for future generations, and for the plant and animal species that assure diversity)—this desire presents an opportunity to deliver on a political priority. Anyone who wants to close their own ''credibility gap'' on environmental issues can do so by talking about conservation of open spaces. . . .

And by actually doing something about it, not just speaking about it.

Let me give some of the findings:

People like to spend their time outdoors. Over half of Americans polled cite an outdoor location like a national park, forest, wilderness areas, beach, shoreline, lake, river, or mountain as their preferred place to spend a vacation this year.

Ninety-four percent would justify spending more on Land & Water Conservation because ''Parks, forests, and seashores provide Americans a chance to visit areas vastly different than their own.''

Those who think the overall quality of the environment is deteriorating outnumber those who think things are improving. Eighty-eight percent of all Americans agree that ''we must act now or we will lose many special places, and if we wait, what is destroyed or lost cannot be replaced.''

They also say this poll defies a myth that some people think of as real, too much public land.

That meant, according to this survey which was conducted by a Republican pollster, it does not hold even in mountainous Western States where over 90 percent, in some places of the land is already owned by the Government. This poll indicates that even in places in the West where lots of land is already owned by the Federal Government, people still want us to make the effort and the small investment it will take to preserve these precious resources to provide wilderness, parks, and forest for our children and grandchildren.

Let me finally read one very startling result because all of us voted for the highway trust fund. We thought we should apply our gasoline taxes to improve the highway system which has been an extraordinary benefit for the growth of this Nation. We did it because we knew it was popular at home, because it was the right thing to do. In my State of Louisiana, and probably in your State, Mr. President, Illinois, people overwhelmingly support it.

Let me share this:

In a head to head between land and water and highway, the wildly popular highway and airport funds head to head was 45 percent for the conservation of land and water and 37 percent for highways.

We know how popular that highway bill was, but people in America—in Louisiana, in Illinois, in Mississippi, in other places, in Washington State—want us to take some of these revenues—not new taxes, not raising taxes, not robbing it from other places—but taking it from the Federal Treasury where it has gone into sort of a nondescript fund and reinvest it into the environment and to do that in a way that shares with the States and local governments—not a Federal land grab, not a Federal takings, but in partnership with local and State governments, and that is what our bill does.

In conclusion, there are over or close to 200 Members of the Senate and the House, Republicans and Democrats. It is the only environmental initiative—there are others that have been filed and talked about and are being debated in committee, outside of committee, in the negotiations taking place right now—but there is not a single proposal that has Democrat and Republican support except for this one.

I urge the White House, I urge the President, I urge the negotiators, whatever is in the bill, if we can afford $300 million, fine. If we can afford $500 million, fine. If we can afford $1 billion, whatever the offset is, I am not asking for more money. But I am asking if we are going to spend offshore oil and gas revenues for 1 year or permanently, that it be done giving Louisiana and Mississippi and Texas and Alabama and the other producing States their fair share; that it will fund to the degree that is possible the coastal initiatives we have outlined.

Yes, there are authorized programs to fully fund land and water conservation and to fund wildlife conservation, historic preservation, and urban parks, which is a package that makes sense. Do my colleagues know why? Because it is fair. It is fair to the east coast; it is fair to the West; it is fair to the South; it is fair to the North; it is fair to the Great Lakes States that do not have an ocean or a gulf, but because they have the Great Lakes, they similarly have situations that need attention.

We have not written a bill that is selfish. We have written a bill that is generous. We have written a bill that we can afford.

I urge the President not to move to take a portion of the revenues that two of the poorest States in the Nation contribute—Mississippi and Louisiana—and give them away without giving us a fair chance at preserving our coastline, helping us restore a tremendous ecosystem that not only benefits our State and the 4 million people who live there, and the 2 million people who live on the coast but literally serves as a treasure for this Nation—an environmental treasure and a commercial base—without which this country could not possibly continue to grow and prosper without.

I am sensitive to the Florida Everglades. I have been to the redwoods. I believe in the preservation of the great lands of the West. I want to be fair to many places in this Nation, but I cannot in good conscience represent the State that is contributing 90 percent of the money and allow these negotiations to go on knowing there is some intention to take this money permanently away from us and give it to everyone else without sharing this with us to help us in our quest to restore this coastline for the benefit of the entire Nation.

I thank my colleagues for their patience. I hold up our plan: ''Coast 2050.'' It is a beautiful picture of Louisiana's coast. I ask my colleagues to be sensitive to our great needs. I am sorry to have to object, but I do it respectfully, and I do it because I know this is the right thing for our country and the Nation at this time.

I yield back the remainder of my time, if I have any.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York.

REGIONAL COOPERATIVE HEALTH PROGRAM FUNDING THROUGH WYE SUPPLEMENTAL ASSISTANCE-FUNDING

Mr. SCHUMER. Mr. President, I rise today to urge the United States Agency for International Development (USAID) to allocate some of its Wye Supplemental Assistance Funding to the first regional cooperative health program ever designed to serve both the Palestinians and Israelis. Improving the health of Palestinians and Israelis through a successful cooperative endeavor would provide a vibrant prescription for peace in the Middle East.

This important health program, which pairs the Kuvin Center for the Study of Infectious and Tropical Diseases of the Hebrew University in Jerusalem with the Palestinian Al-Quds

University, has requested support from USAID as a $20 million, five-year program. The purpose of this program is to find innovative ways to fight infectious diseases in the region, and calls upon these Universities to build a permanent, collaborative infrastructure for improving the health of the Palestinian and Israeli people.

United States Secretary of State Madeleine Albright has said the most important projects for promoting peace and cooperation between nations are what she calls ''people projects''—those projects that people of all races, religions, and beliefs can support. This program, which seeks to protect local people from the infectious and parasitic diseases that are among the leading causes of death in the West Bank and Gaza, is a great example of fostering cooperation through people projects of mutual interest.

USAID has successfully funded similar health programs in Egypt and Turkey, but this is the first such program proposed for the Israeli and Palestinian people. Members of Congress, the President, and the State Department all support this program. If USAID funds the program, it would give the United States scientific and fiscal oversight through both USAID and the National Institutes of Health (NIH).

I support the funding for this regional collaborative effort as a powerful example of what a working relationship should be in the Middle East and I believe that it should be given the highest funding priority out of the Wye package.

THE FEMA EMERGENCY FOOD AND SHELTER ACT

Ms. COLLINS. Mr. President, as a cosponsor of S. 1516, legislation reauthorizing the Federal Emergency Administration's Emergency Food and Shelter program, I am very pleased that the Senate is about to pass this legislation and send it to the House of Representatives. I hope that our colleagues in the House will swiftly approve this important bill, so that it can be sent to President Clinton for his signature before our legislative session adjourns for the year.

FEMA's Emergency Food and Shelter (EFS) program provides financial assistance to supplement community efforts to provide food, shelter, and other valuable items to homeless and hungry people around the country. Most of the EFS' monies are distributed directly to local boards, which are comprised of representatives from religious and charitable organizations from the surrounding area. These boards then award grants to non-profit, voluntary, and social service organizations, which assist individuals with their food, shelter, or emergency assistance costs. Using a local distribution network helps to ensure that the EFS' funds are targeted to those who most need assistance.

To its credit, FEMA has been very successful in keeping the administrative costs of this program very low. In fact, these costs consume less than 3 percent of the funding, which is an inspiring example that all of the Federal Government's agencies and departments should strive to follow.

In Maine, the EFS program has been extremely helpful. For example the Sister Mary O'Donnell Shelter, located in Presque Isle, Maine, received a $10,500 grant from this program. Amazingly enough, this shelter was able to use this modest funding to provide the equivalent of 1,974 nights of shelter for the homeless in northern Maine.

EFS is a very successful program that carefully targets its resources where they are needed most, and does so with an absolute minimum of administrative expense. The Government Affairs Committee approved this legislation with a unanimous voice vote on November 3, 1999, and I hope the full Senate will do likewise.

DEVELOPMENTAL DISABILITIES ASSISTANCE AND BILL OF RIGHTS ACT

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I strongly support the current reauthorization of the Developmental Disabilities Act, and I commend Senator JEFFORDS for his leadership in making this reauthorization a priority.

I also commend the members of the Health, Education, Labor, and Pensions Committee and the administration for their leadership in developing this bipartisan bill. I especially want to recognize TOM HARKIN for his leadership and continued commitment to individuals with disabilities. I also commend all the staff members for their skillful work to make this process successful.

Today, I particularly want to take this opportunity to say thank you to my sister Eunice Kennedy Shriver for her many years of extraordinary dedication and commitment to children and adults with mental retardation and their families. Had it not been for her vision and commitment on behalf of people with mental retardation, the Developmental Disabilities Act would not be the impressive success it is today.

For many years, since the Developmental Disabilities Act was first signed into law by President Kennedy in 1963, developmental disabilities programs in the states have worked effectively to improve the lives of children and adults with mental retardation and other developmental disabilities. The act serves as the foundation for a network of programs that offer them real choices on where to live, work, go to school, and participate in community life.

Through these programs, the 4 million individuals with mental retardation and other developmental disabilities are able to obtain the support they need to participate in all aspects of the community. They receive needed assistance in education, and early intervention efforts are used to provide appropriate health care services and support.

For millions of Americans these services can mean the difference between dependence and independence, between lost potential and becoming contributing and participating members of their communities.

Throughout the preparation of this legislation, we have listened to consumers, advocates, families, and program administrators—all of whom have contributed significantly to this legislation. Their commitment to constructive compromise will improve the lives and choices of all people with disabilities and their families.

This reauthorization builds on the gains of the past three decades, while addressing critical and emerging needs of individuals with disabilities.

It improves the accountability of the programs under the Act by emphasizing better coordination, and by concentrating on activities related to child care, health care, housing, transportation, and recreation;

It offers wider training opportunities by strengthening the network of university centers that provide technical assistance to persons with disabilities, to their families, and to service providers across the country;

It supports stronger protection and advocacy services to prevent abuse and neglect, so that people with disabilities can live safely;

It targets funds for the development of statewide self-advocacy organizations, so that people with disabilities will have a stronger voice in determining their lives and their future;

It helps states to develop support programs for families with a disabled family member, so that living at home and becoming part of the community is a real choice for persons with disabilities; and

It provides funds to develop a new educational curriculum and establish scholarship opportunities for support workers who assist people with developmental disabilities.

This bill gives us an excellent opportunity to do more to keep the promise of the Americans with Disabilities Act—by ensuring that individuals with mental retardation and other significant developmental disabilities, and their families, have realistic opportunities to obtain the support and services they need to reach their dream of being contributing members of their communities.

Disabled people are not unable. We are a better and stronger and fairer country when we open the door of choice and opportunity to all Americans, and enable them to be full partners in the American dream. For countless persons with mental retardation and other developmental disabilities across the country, this legislation will continue to help to make that dream come true.

This bill deserves the support of every Member of Congress, and I look forward to its prompt enactment into law.

STATEMENTS ON INTRODUCED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

By Mrs. HUTCHISON (for herself, Mr. NICKLES, Mr. BROWNBACK, Mr. VOINOVICH, Mr. ASHCROFT, Mr. CRAIG, Mr. ENZI, Mr. THOMAS, and Mr. HELMS):

S. 1878. A bill to amend the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 to provide that an employee's ''regular rate'' for purposes of calculating compensation will not be affected by certain additional payments; to the Committee on Health, Education, Labor, and Pensions.

BONUS INCENTIVE ACT OF 1999

Mrs. HUTCHISON. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce the Bonus Incentive Act of 1999. I am joined in introducing this bill by my colleagues, Senators NICKLES, BROWNBACK, VOINOVICH, ASHCROFT, CRAIG, ENZI, and THOMAS. This important legislation will give America's hourly wage workers the same ability to receive performance-based bonuses that salaried employees currently have.

Mr. President, under the Fair Labor Standards Act, employers who give performance-based bonuses (usually at the end of the year) must go back and recalculate each employee's hourly base rate of pay and thus any overtime pay they received must be adjusted accordingly. Often, the employer must spend many hours of accountants' time for relatively minor adjustments in overtime pay.

This unnecessary and overly burdensome requirement discourages many employers (those who even know about this obscure provision) from providing a performance-based bonus system to their hourly wage employees, while salaried or ''exempt'' employees can enjoy such bonuses. Other employers attempt to comply with the law by reclassifying bonuses as not being performance-based. The net result of this law has been to hamper the productivity of the American worker and to trap unwary employers with unnecessary paperwork and even fines.

My legislation, the companion of which has been passed by the House Education and Workforce Committee, would allow performance-based bonuses to be paid to employees without the need to recalculate overtime pay, provided that employees are made fully aware of the requirements of receiving such bonuses and provided that such bonuses are not used as a substitute for hourly pay.

Mr. President, when the Fair Labor Standards Act (FLSA) was enacted in 1938, over 60 years ago, employers typically rewarded only their management personnel for the level of their achievement with performance-based bonuses. Such bonus programs for employees were very rare. But times have changed, and so has the American workplace. With the rise of the service-sector, post-industrial economy, increased competition from overseas, and the growing importance of workplace productivity and efficiency, ''gainsharing'' and other performance-based bonus programs for workers are commonplace.

Such programs are as varied as they are common. The model that comes first to mind is a bonus based on the number of items a factory worker produces in a month, quarter, or year. But gainsharing programs are equally effective in the service sector. Pam Farr, former senior vice president for Marriott Lodging and now president of the Cabot Advisory Group, recently testified before the House Education and the Workforce Committee that Marriott used gainsharing plans for housekeeping and customer service personnel that rewarded employees for the cleanliness of rooms, and customer service evaluations. Cordant Technologies, which makes solid rocket boosters for the space shuttle, rewards its workers for achieving goals involving workplace safety, customer satisfaction, and indirect cost reduction.

Whatever type of gainsharing arrangement an employer may have, there can be no doubt that these programs increase workers' pay, productivity, and contribute to higher customer satisfaction and better workplace relations. Studies have demonstrated that employees who participate in gainsharing arrangements on average receive about 5 to 10 percent more pay from such participation, and many bonus programs allow employees to increase their base pay by as much as 50 percent.

Employees who participate in these programs also report being more satisfied on the job and to have a more positive attitude toward their employer. A 1981 survey by the General Accounting Office found that over 80 percent of firms they interviewed reported improvements in labor-management relations from such programs. Grievances in such companies dropped 50 percent, and absenteeism by 20 percent when gainsharing was offered to workers.

Unfortunately, the majority of performance-based bonus programs are offered only to one segment of the American workforce: those employees who are salaried and therefore ''exempt'' from many of the strictures of the Fair Labor Standards Act. The other 70-plus million Americans who get paid by the hour are precluded from fully participating in these programs. Why is this? If performance bonuses work so well, why aren't they offered to more hourly wage workers?

The answer is that the 61-year-old FLSA requires that when such bonuses are provided to hourly workers, the employer must then re-calculate each employee's ''regular rate'' of pay, which in turn requires a recalculation of worker's overtime pay. This process of recalculating employee overtime can consume substantial administrative time, often for very little in the way of additional overtime pay. One human resources director testified before Congress that it took four people 160 hours to calculate the bonuses for 235 employees.

This requirement can be particularly burdensome for many of the nation's millions of small businesses that may not have computer hardware and software that can run these types of calculations. For employers who must try to do these calculations by hand, it can be such a headache that the employer will either drop the bonus program altogether or simply ignore the law, both of which are obviously undesirable outcomes.

The Bonus Incentive Act I am introducing today will alleviate this unnecessary and counterproductive requirement, and allow all employees to participate equally in gainsharing programs. In fact, by extending these programs to hourly wage employees who, on average, make less than their salaried counterparts, this bill could be a significant shot-in-the-arm to their take home pay. The Employee Policy Foundation reports that a median wage U.S. worker could earn between an additional $17,000 and $26,000 over a 20-year period by participating in a performance-based bonus plan.

Why would anyone oppose this bill, Mr. President? It is good for employers and employees alike. It means less paperwork and more pay, less bureaucracy and more productivity.

Some have raised the concern that employers may somehow attempt to disguise regular hourly pay as gainsharing bonuses. While it would take a very ambitious employer to make such a scheme profitable, particularly considering the impact such conduct would have on employee morale, there are protections in the bill against such a possibility.

First, the employer must provide all employees, in writing, a detailed description of what the requirements and benefits of the gainsharing plan will be. The actual formula by which the bonus is to be calculated must also be spelled-out. There can be no doubt about what the employee would be required to do and what he or she would stand gain.

Second, the employer is absolutely prohibited from using a performance-based bonus to in any way replace the hourly wage pay the employee would otherwise have received. In fact, the bill requires that the plan be ''established and maintained in good faith for the purpose of distributing to employees additional remuneration over and above the wages and salaries that are not dependent upon the existence of such plan.'' If an employer should violate this and, for example, but workers pay and substitute that for bonus pay, that employer would be subject to the same civil and even criminal sanctions as he would for any violation of the Fair Labor Standards Act, which is vigorously enforced by the U.S. Department of Labor's Wage and Hour Division.

But the truth is, Mr. President, that there is very little reason for employers today to abuse this provision, and every reason in the world to use it for the betterment of employees and to the long-term success of the company. If the tremendous economic revolution and growth we have witnessed in the last two decades has taught us anything, it is that wealth is not a zero-sum game. Our economy continues to outstrip that of the rest of the world not because we have more natural resources: other countries have more oil, gold, timber, and other resources than we. It is because the productive capacity, ingenuity, and entrepreneurship of the American people is allowed to flourish under our system.

Outdated laws such as this must be revised if we are to continue to enjoy the growing fruits of our labor. The Bonus Incentive Act will help accomplish this goal, and I urge my colleagues to support and pass it.

By Mr. KENNEDY (for himself, Mr. AKAKA, Mr. INOUYE, Mrs. LINCOLN, and Mr. WELLSTONE):

S. 1880. A bill to amend the Public Health Service Act to improve the health of minority individuals; to the Committee on Health, Education, Labor, and Pensions.

HEALTH CARE FAIRNESS ACT OF 1999

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, over the past few decades, we have made extraordinary advances as a nation in science and medicine. Unfortunately, those advances are not benefitting all of our citizens equally. Minority communities suffer disproportionately from many severe health problems.

We know that poverty, lack of health insurance, and other barriers to care continue to undermine the health of minorities. Clearly we need to do more to give all Americans the fair chance for a healthy future that they deserve.

The Administration has taken important steps to address this challenge. Last year, the President announced the Initiative to Eliminate Racial and Ethnic Disparities in Health. This initiative, led by the Department of Health and Human Services, has identified several areas where new commitments, new ideas, and new resources are necessary. The goal is to eliminate disparities in the areas of cardiovascular disease, cancer screening and management, diabetes, infant mortality, HIV/AIDS, and immunizations by 2010. This ambitious goal cannot be met without a major effort to improve research on the health of minorities and develop the steps needed to reduce these disparities.

Today, Senators AKAKA, INOUYE, LINCOLN, WELLSTONE, and I are introducing the Health Care Fairness Act of 1999, to secure the commitment and resources needed in each of these areas to ensure that minorities have a fair chance for improved health.

Minority populations suffer disproportionately from cardiovascular disease. They have a greater risk of developing high blood pressure, and are less likely to receive treatment to manage the condition after it develops. As a result, African Americans are 40 percent more likely to die from coronary heart disease than whites.

A Georgetown University study published in the New England Journal of Medicine last February found that bias in the decisions made by doctors is a factor in the treatment that African Americans receive when they suffer from heart disease. These findings are based on an experiment where physicians volunteered to view a video of actors posing as patients with significant symptoms of heart disease. The physicians were asked to prescribe further interventions for each ''patient,'' all of whom had identical medical histories, insurance coverage, and occupations. While 91 percent of the white males, white females, and African American males in the study were referred for cardiac catheterization, a more effective but more expensive diagnostic procedure, only 79 percent of the African American females in the study were referred for this test.

A study published in the New England Journal of Medicine last month found similar disparities in the treatment of lung cancer. Patients whose tumors are discovered early are often able to be cured with surgery. This study found that African American patients with tumors small enough to be surgically removed were treated surgically in only 64 percent of cases, compared with 77 percent of white patients treated surgically. As a result, African Americans have only a 26 percent chance of surviving lung cancer, compared with a 34 percent survival rate for whites.

Other types of cancer also strike racial and ethnic minorities in disproportionate numbers. Vietnamese American women are five times more likely than white women to contract cervical cancer. Hispanic women are twice as likely to contract cervical cancer. Native Hawaiian men are 13 percent more likely to contact lung cancer. Alaskan Native women are 72 percent more likely to contract colon cancer and rectal cancer, when compared with whites. In addition, African Americans and Hispanic Americans are more likely to be diagnosed with cancer once the disease has reached an advanced stage. For African Americans, the result is a 35 percent higher death rate.

The Institute of Medicine, issued a report last February concluding that federal efforts to research cancer in minority communities are insufficient. The report recommended an increase in resources and the development of a strategic plan to coordinate this research. The results of this study confirm that while NIH has been extremely successful in producing medical breakthroughs that improve health care, those breakthroughs do not always reach into racial and ethnic communities.

The same troubling differences are found with HIV/AIDS. The powerful new drugs that have dramatically decreased AIDS deaths and prevented or delayed progression from HIV to AIDS for so many citizens are not reaching minorities in proportion to their need. Racial and ethnic minorities make up approximately 25 percent of the total population, but these groups account for over half of all AIDS cases. The disparity is even greater for African American and Hispanic women, who account for nearly 80 percent of the AIDS cases reported among women.

In spite of recent bipartisan efforts to increase access to health care for all children, racial and ethnic disparities exist among young Americans as well. Minority children are less likely to receive prescription medications, and they have lower immunization rates than white children. Inadequate health care places a barrier in the path of healthy development for minority children, and that is an unfair disadvantage.

The Health Care Fairness Act of 1999 addresses these racial and ethnic health disparities in many ways. It contains sections on research, data collection, medical education, and outreach. Each of these aspects has an important role to play in the reduction and eventual elimination of these unacceptable health disparities.

Title I establishes a Center for Research on Minority Health at the National Institutes of Health. The Center will oversee the development of an NIH-wide strategic plan for minority health research. This step will enable those concerned with the advancement of research on minority health, both inside and outside NIH, to monitor the progress of NIH in this area. The Center will award Centers of Excellence grants to institutions across the country that serve under-represented populations. These funds will be used to conduct research into the nature, causes, and remedies for health disparties, to train minorities to become biomedical research professionals, to improve the infrastructure for conducting biomedical research on health disparties, and to provide long-term stability to these biomedical research programs.

Changing attitudes about race and ethnic backgrounds are an ongoing challenge for all sectors of our society. The Georgetown study does not conclude that most doctors are racist. No such assumptions are drawn from its results. What is shown is that health care providers, like all members of our society, enter their profession with perceptions and biases related to race. Many industries have confronted racial sensitivity issues in their training programs. This study shows that such training must also be a part of medical education, for both new students and experienced practitioners alike.

To help health care providers improve their ability to work with patients of different backgrounds, we must also develop educational techniques that are effective in improving this aspect of health care delivery. Title II of the Health Care Finance Act establishes demonstration projects to develop effective educational techniques such as courses that focus on reducing racial and ethnic disparties in health care.

The close connection between race and poverty in this country has had a significant negative impact on the access of minority communities to quality health care. Reducing racial and ethnic health disparties will require a better understanding of issues beyond effective treatments and other questions of basic science. Barriers to care, poor quality health services, and the lack of useful outcome measures are all part of this complex problem. Title III of our bill strengthens the federal commitment to these social science aspects of health disparties. It directs the Agency for Health Care Policy and Research to conduct and support research in these areas, to promote effective interventions in minority communities, and to develop outcome measures to assess and improve health care for minority populations.

Measuring our progress in reducing these racial and ethnic disparties will also require reliable and complete data on miniority health. In order to provide reliable information on the health status of minority communities, Title IV of our bill directs the National Academy of Sciences to conduct a study of the data collection and reporting systems at the Department of Health and Human Services that include race and ethnicity.

This study will evaluate the effectiveness of data collection at HHS and recommend improvements for ensuring that reliable and complete information on racial and ethnic health disparties is available.

The estimated cost of these provisions for fiscal year 2000 totals just under $350 million. The estimated cost in subsequent years is approximately $260 million. This is a small price when compared to the damage that racial and ethnic health disparties are causing in so many communities. We all know that in the long run better health is always less expensive than sickness and hospitalization.

We know that many other structural, personal, and historical factors contribute to racial and ethnic disparties in health care. Our legislation asks that we make the elimination of these disparties a higher priority. It asks that we do all we can to develop the knowledge necessary to do better. The result will be a fairer chance for the healthy future that all Americans deserve, and I look forward to early action by Congress on this needed legislation.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the full text of the bill and the accompanying letters and statement of support be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 1880

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE; TABLE OF CONTENTS.

(a) SHORT TITLE.—This Act may be cited as the ''Health Care Fairness Act of 1999''.

(b) TABLE OF CONTENTS.—The table of contents of this Act is as follows:

SEC. 2. FINDINGS.

Congress makes the following findings:

(1) The United States ranks below most industrialized nations in health status as measured by longevity, sickness, and mortality.

(2) The United States ranks 24th among industrialized nations in infant mortality.

(3) This poor rank in health status is attributed in large measure to the lower health status of America's minority populations.

(4) Many minority groups suffer disproportionately from cancer. Disparities exist in both mortality and incidence rates. For men and women combined, African Americans have a cancer death rate about 35 percent higher than that for whites. Paralleling the death rate, the incidence rate for lung cancer in African American men is about 50 percent higher than white men. Native Hawaiian men also have elevated rates of lung cancer compared with white men. Alaskan Native men and women suffer from higher rates of cancers of the colon and rectum than do whites. Vietnamese women in the United States have a cervical cancer incidence rate more than 5 times greater than white women. Hispanic women also suffer elevated rates of cervical cancer.

(5) Infant death rates among African American, Native Americans and Alaskan Natives, and Hispanics were well above the national average. The greatest disparity exists for African Americans. The overall Native American rate does not reflect the diversity among Indian communities, some of which have infant mortality rates approaching twice the national rate.

(6) Sudden infant death syndrome (referred to in this section as ''SIDS'') accounts for approximately 10 percent of all infant deaths in the first year of life. Minority populations are at greater risk for SIDS. In addition to the greater risks among African Americans, the rates are 3 to 4 times as high for some Native American and Alaskan Native populations.

(7) Cardiovascular disease is the leading cause of death for all racial and ethnic groups. Major disparities exist among population groups, with a disproportionate burden of death and disability from cardiovascular disease in minority and low-income populations. Stroke is the only leading cause of death for which mortality is higher for Asian-American males than for white males.

(8) Racial and ethnic minorities have higher rates of hypertension, tend to develop hypertension at an earlier age, and are less likely to undergo treatment to control their high blood pressure.

(9) Diabetes, the seventh leading cause of death in the United States, is a serious public health problem affecting racial and ethnic communities. The prevalence of diabetes in African Americans is approximately 70 percent higher than whites and the prevalence in Hispanics is nearly double that of whites. The prevalence rate of diabetes among Native Americans and Alaskan Natives is more than twice that for the total population and at least 1 tribe, the Pimas of Arizona, have the highest known prevalence of diabetes of any population in the world.

(10) The human immunodeficiency virus (referred to in this section as ''HIV''), which causes acquired immune deficiency syndrome (referred to in this section as ''AIDS''), results in disproportionate suffering in minority populations. Minority persons represent 25 percent of the total United States population, but 54 percent of all cases of AIDS.

(11) More than 75 percent of AIDS cases reported among women and children occur in minority women and children.

(12) Nearly 2 of 5 (38 percent) Hispanic adults, 1 of 4 (24 percent) African American adults, and 1 of 4 (24 percent) Asian-American adults are uninsured, compared with 1 of 7 (14 percent) white adults.

(13) Elderly minorities experience disparities in access to care and health status, in part because medicare covers only half the health care expenses of older Americans.

(14) Two of 5 Hispanic and 2 of 5 African Americans age 65 and older rate their health status as fair or poor, compared with less than 1 of 4 (23 percent) white Americans 65 and over.

(15) Nearly 2 of 5 (39 percent) African American adults and almost half (46 percent) of Hispanic adults report that they do not have a regular doctor, compared with 1 of 4 (26 percent) of white adults.

(16) Minority Americans 65 and older are less likely to have a regular doctor or to see a specialist.

(17) Ninety percent of minority physicians produced by Historically Black Medical Colleges live and serve in minority communities.

(18) Almost half (45 percent) of Hispanic adults, 2 of 5 (41 percent) Asian-American adults, and more than 1 of 3 (35 percent) African American adults report difficulty paying for medical care, compared with 1 of 4 (26 percent) white adults.

(19) Despite suffering disproportionate rates of illness, death, and disability, minorities have not been proportionately represented in many clinical research trials, except in studies of behavioral risk factors associated with negative stereotypes.

(20) Culturally sensitive approaches to research are needed to encourage minority participation in research studies.

(21) There is a national need for minority scientists in the field of biomedical, clinical, and health services research.

(22) In 1990, only 3.3 percent of all United States medical school faculties were underrepresented minority persons.

(23) Only 1 percent of full professors were underrepresented minority persons in 1990.

(24) The proportion of underrepresented minorities in high academic ranks, such as professors and associated professors, decreased from 1980 to 1990.

(25) African Americans with identical complaints of chest pain are less likely than white Americans to be referred by physicians for sophisticated cardiac tests.

(26) Cultural competency training in medical schools and residency training programs has the potential to reduce disparities in health care and health outcomes.

(27) More detailed data on health disparities is needed to—

(A) evaluate the impact that race and ethnicity have on health status, access to care, and quality of care; and

(B) enforce existing protections for equal access to care.

TITLE I—IMPROVING MINORITY HEALTH THROUGH THE NATIONAL INSTITUTES OF HEALTH

SEC. 101. RESEARCH ON MINORITY HEALTH.
